EXTENSION OF REMARKS

Mr. COCHRAN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to revise and extend the remarks I made today and to quote from the report and also to include a letter from the Attorney General.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Missouri?

There was no objection.

CLAIMS OF MESSRS. GEORGE A. CARDEN AND ANDERSON T. HERD

Mr. WEAVER. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of the bill (H. R. 7230) to provide for an appeal to the Supreme Court of the United States from the decision of the Court of Claims in a suit instituted by George A. Carden and Anderson T. Herd.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the House resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of the bill (H. R. 7230) with Mr. LUTHER A. JOHNSON in the chair.

The Clerk read the title of the bill.

Mr. WEAVER. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that the first reading of the bill be dispensed with.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from North Carolina?

There was no objection.

Mr. WEAVER. Mr. Chairman, as I understand it, the rule provides for 1 hour of general debate, one-half to be controlled by the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. GUYER] and one-half by myself.

Does the gentleman from Kansas wish to use some time now?

Mr. GUYER of Kansas. Mr. Chairman, I yield 5 minutes to the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. SCHAFER].

Mr. SCHAFER of Wisconsin. Mr. Chairman, I do not believe that I shall use the entire 5 minutes. I simply want to call attention to a perfecting amendment which I shall offer under the 5-minute rule. I shall not discuss the merits of this claim, for I approach my consideration of this bill on the question as to whether or not we should let these claimants have a right to appeal to the Supreme Court of the United States on the law and the facts considered by the Court of Claims. I shall consider this bill on the sole basis of allowing these claimants a right of appeal to the Supreme Court of the United States on the law and the facts developed before the Court of Claims. We are told by the proponents that is all they desire. If the bill is perfected by incorporating my amendment, I believe that our distinguished colleague the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. COCHRAN] will be able to support the measure, because if I can trust the Supreme Court of the United States as now constituted on an actual appeal on the question of law and fact, I believe he should be able to do so.

Mr. COCHRAN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SCHAFER of Wisconsin. In just a moment I will yield to the gentleman.

My objection to the bill as now written is that it increases the jurisdiction and the authority of the United States Supreme Court beyond the power to review all questions of law and fact which were before the Court of Claims. The bill, as reported, sets up the United States Supreme Court as a super court of claims to determine additional facts rather than simply consider the law and the facts brought up on appeal from the Court of Claims. This is my amendment, and I hope that the Members on both sides will take the bill and observe just how my amendment perfects and restricts the bill. My amendment will be offered to page 2, and strikes out all of line 6, and also strikes out the comma at the end of line 5, and inserts a period in lieu thereof.

Mr. PITTENGER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SCHAFER of Wisconsin. In just a moment.

If my amendment is incorporated in this bill, the bill will be exactly and precisely what its proponents have stated it to be on the floor of the House, to wit, a bill to give these claimants a day in court and the right to appeal to the United States Supreme Court on the facts and the law considered by the Court of Claims. I do not believe that there are many Members of this Congress who will not extend that right to these claimants. If my amendment is adopted, I cannot see how the gentleman from Missouri, Brother COCHRAN, or any of the New Deal Members on the right-hand side of the aisle, can oppose the measure when it gives the Supreme Court, as now constituted, a New Deal controlled Supreme Court, merely the right to accept jurisdiction on appeal and consider the facts and the law as developed and considered by the Court of Claims.

I yield first to the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. COCHRAN].

Mr. COCHRAN. The gentleman from Missouri will not support the bill giving a direct appeal to the United States Supreme Court, which is denied every other citizen and corporation in the United States.

Mr. SCHAFER of Wisconsin. I served on the Claims Committee for many years, and know that at the time this claims bill was considered by the Court of Claims there was no provision for these claimants to have the right of appeal to the United States Supreme Court. Subsequent to that time, under laws enacted by the Congress and supported by the gentleman from Missouri, many claimants have been given the right to appeal to the United States Supreme Court. Of course, the gentleman can take the position that he wants to let a claimant go into the back door of the United States Supreme Court, but does not want to let him in the front door; but I do not take that position.

And may I say to the gentleman from Missouri that I can trust the New Deal Supreme Court as now constituted to review the law and the facts on appeal, even though the gentleman cannot.

Mr. PITTENGER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SCHAFER of Wisconsin. Yes.

Mr. PITTENGER. The very purpose of this bill is to do what the gentleman says his amendment will do. Then, why is it necessary to have the amendment?

Mr. SCHAFER of Wisconsin. For the simple reason that the bill as reported gives additional authority to the United States Supreme Court and sets up the United States Supreme Court as a sort of super claims court to consider other things than the questions of law and fact which were before the Court of Claims. The bill now reads:

> Jurisdiction is hereby conferred upon the Supreme Court to consider on such appeal all questions of law and fact, including the fair market value of the property involved.

My amendment strikes out—

> Including the fair market value of the property involved.

If the fair market value of the property involved was not considered as a question of law and fact by the Court of Claims, if we enact this bill with the language which I propose to strike, then we are setting up the United States Supreme Court as a new supercourt of claims to consider questions other than an appeal on all questions of law and fact which were considered by the Court of Claims.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Wisconsin has expired.

Mr. WEAVER. Mr. Chairman, I yield myself 10 minutes.

Mr. TABER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield to me for a question?

Mr. WEAVER. Yes.

Mr. TABER. There are some things about this that I have not been able to understand. For instance, there is a receipt that appears on page 15 of the committee report where these people signed a receipt for a little over $6,000,000 and gave bills of sale. There is a reservation in that statement with reference to $20 per ton net deadweight payment for the release of those vessels from the restrictions with reference to trade, and over on page 16 there is a statement that the United States paid to the Austrian owners for the removal of the trade restrictions $20 per deadweight ton. I cannot understand from anything that I have been able to find in the report or from anything said on the floor what the basis is for any claim. I have been over the matter as carefully as I could in the time that I have had.

Mr. WEAVER. If I catch the trouble which the gentleman has, I call his attention to the findings that Commissioner Ramseyer——

Mr. TABER. And where do they appear?

Mr. WEAVER. They are set out in his report on page 90, that these claimants were to receive $6,477,000, representing the original cost of the ships to them, and an allowance of $301,000 for expenses, and that made up the $6,778,000. I did not catch the drift of the other question.

Mr. TABER. This was a receipt indicating that they had been paid in full that amount of money. I cannot understand what the basis of the claim is. There is nothing in the report or anything else in the testimony or statements that have been made here indicating that these people have any legitimate claim against the Government.

Mr. ROBSION of Kentucky. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield to me?

Mr. WEAVER. I yield.

Mr. ROBSION of Kentucky. In the first place, there were 52,000 dead-weight tons. These people got the ships for $120 a dead-weight ton. After that they formed a syndicate and they sold the ships to the syndicate for $140 a net dead-weight ton, which netted them a profit of $750,000, with this additional proposition—that they would have the right to offer these ships for the syndicate at 5 percent of the gross receipts. The Government now comes along and takes these ships for $128 a ton. These people have to give up their right to $140 net dead-weight ton, and then the Government, as we claim, agreed to let them operate the ships at 5 percent. Later on the Government used the ships itself and let the Allies have some of them and never let Carden and Herd operate them at all. That was a violation of the contract agreement, and after the Government had used them during the war, and after the war, the ships that had not been sunk were sold by the Government for $150 a net dead-weight ton.

Mr. TABER. Why did these people sign this receipt? It seems to me a complete receipt. It does seem to me that people who deal with the Government should at least do so on the same basis as they would with me or with the gentleman.

Mr. COX. I wonder if it would not be of aid to the gentleman from New York to consider this fact, that in the two bills of sale Carden and Herd executed the consideration is recited as being $1 and other good and valuable considerations. That was the right of contract to operate the ships, the same right they had under the contract with the syndicate.

Mr. TABER. Why would not that be in the contract? That is something that I cannot understand.

Mr. ROBSION of Kentucky. It is in that contract.

Mr. COX. Yes, it is in the agreement.

Mr. WEAVER. Mr. Chairman, I shall make a short statement of the history of this case. In April 1917, seven Austrian ships were interned in the harbor of New York and elsewhere. They had been compelled to take refuge in neutral harbors to evade destruction by the navies of the Allies. Messrs. Herd and Carden were ship operators and they naturally saw an opportunity to buy these ships at a very low price, because of the fact that the ships could not be safely moved from the harbor.

They entered into an agreement with the Austrian owners based upon payment to them of $123 per gross ton for these seven merchant vessels. They then formed a syndicate and I wish to talk about that for a moment, directly. They formed a syndicate of seven men to provide this money, approximately six or seven million dollars to pay the Austrian owners. Mr. Herd gave his own check for the initial payment of 10 percent. This syndicate was formed for this purpose and the agreement between Messrs. Herd and Carden was that the syndicate should pay them $140 per gross ton for the vessels; and what is important in the consideration of this case that they should have the right to operate the ships at a commission of 5 percent. That was the real moving purpose of the agreement between Messrs. Herd and Carden and the syndicate, as Herd and Carden were ship operators. That was their business and at the time the operation of ships and the carrying of freight was a very lucrative undertaking.

I am going to ask the Members to remember that this contract was not a conjectural thing. It already existed and 10 percent had been paid and accepted by the Austrian owners.

Mr. HANCOCK. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WEAVER. I yield.

Mr. HANCOCK. Is it not a fact that the down payment, although paid by Mr. Herd's check, represented a contribution by the syndicate? I understand Mr. Herd had no money at all and he made a deposit in his name from the members of the syndicate and paid the down payment with his own check.

Mr. WEAVER. Mr. Herd gave his own check for it and the syndicate reimbursed their proportionate parts of it for the 10 percent of the amount.

Then they came to Washington. President Wilson directed Mr. Baruch to take the ships and he did not leave him any alternative. Of course, he went to Mr. Denman and it was discussed and the President himself directed and Mr. Baruch reported to him the facts about this syndicate. The President directed him and required him to unravel the syndicate.

Mr. HINSHAW. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WEAVER. I yield.

Mr. HINSHAW. If these ships had not been purchased by the two gentlemen mentioned in this bill and the ships had been allowed to remain in the harbor after April 6, 1917, could the Government of the United States have taken over these ships and settled for them after the war?

Mr. WEAVER. I take it that they could have taken them over and settled for them, as they did certain German-owned ships, and pay for them at the market value of the ships.

Mr. HINSHAW. I note by the statement of the committee that this contract was entered into on the 5th day of April, which was the day after the Congress of the United States received the bill declaring war.

Mr. WEAVER. That may be true, but the negotiations had been going on for some time. They had to get the consent from the United States authorities to purchase the ships. All that had been going on for sometime previous.

Mr. WEAVER. Mr. Chairman, I yield myself 5 additional minutes.

Mr. COSTELLO. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WEAVER. Yes; I yield.

Mr. COSTELLO. I understand that Carden and Herd first offered these ships to Mr. Denman, who was chairman of the Shipping Board, with a provision in their contract that not only were they to get a slight profit on the sale, but also that they were to operate these ships at 33⅓ percent of the net profits. Is not that the reason that President Wilson rejected that offer, because of that operating provision in the offer, and he sent Baruch down to negotiate the purchase of the ships because he would not accept that operating proposition?

Mr. WEAVER. That was not accepted, but it was negotiated between Mr. Denman and these gentlemen after the President had directed them to take the ships.

Now, on the question of this syndicate, which seems to trouble some gentlemen, this is what Mr. Ramseyer said about it, on page 89 of the hearings:

> Plaintiffs then informed Baruch about the sale of the ships to the New York syndicate. On this situation Baruch had to see the President. After seeing the President, Baruch told plaintiffs that it was the President's desire that they go to New York and unravel their sale to the syndicate. This the plaintiffs agreed to try to do. Before leaving for New York, Plaintiff Carden transmitted a letter to Baruch, which reads as follows:
> "DEAR MR. BARUCH: I saw Mr. Denman. He assured me we should operate the boats, provided we would do so on the same terms as other competent shipping concerns and this we propose doing. I am going to New York in the morning and use my earnest endeavors to secure the consent of all persons interested to a compliance with your expressed wishes. I will report to you within the next 3 or 4 days."

This is a finding of fact from the evidence.

> The plaintiffs went to New York, reported the President's wishes and their negotiations with Baruch to the syndicate. The syndicate agreed to the recision of the sale and plaintiffs refunded to the syndicate the initial payment to them on the ships.

Now, if you have any doubt about it, on page 59 of this record is the solemn affidavit made by one of the members of that syndicate, Mr. J. H. Carpenter, in which he details the transaction and concludes his affidavit by saying, "by reason thereof affiant and other members of the syndicate consented to a recision of its contract with Messrs. Carden and Herd."

Mr. KEEFE. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WEAVER. Surely.

Mr. KEEFE. There appears in the report a letter dated February 3, 1921, signed George A. Carden, one of the claimants, addressed to the President of the United States, setting forth Carden's contention as to the merits of this claim. From that letter it very clearly appears that the claimants here turned back the contract they had with the syndicate in response to President Wilson's request that they use this purchase as a precedent so that the Government could obtain these ships without profit, and that it was a patriotic duty they were performing in releasing these ships to the Government without expectation of profit on the transaction.

There is the letter of one of the claimants himself. They entered into this transaction with the understanding that there would be no profit on the transaction itself, but that they would have the right to operate the ships.

Mr. WEAVER. That is correct.

Mr. KEEFE. Is the claim of these people based upon what he contended in that letter, namely, the 5 percent profit arising from the operation of the ships? Is that the basis of the claim?

Mr. WEAVER. That is the foundation of the complaint.

Mr. KEEFE. What in addition to that is the basis of this claim?

Mr. WEAVER. There is none.

Mr. KEEFE. Then, if that is the basis of the claim why is a bill brought in here containing a provision authorizing the Supreme Court of the United States to find the value of these ships? Was it so they might assess damages based upon a conjectural value rather than upon the value which the claimants themselves placed on these ships when they sold them to the Government of the United States? I would like an answer to that.

Mr. WEAVER. Mr. Chairman, I yield myself 5 additional minutes.

Mr. JONKMAN. The point in disagreement between these claimants and the Government was on the question of the right to operate the ships. Had I the time I could read the facts found by the War Contract Adjustment Board in which they upheld every single contention made by these men. Carden & Herd claimed the right to operate these ships. The Government said that was not the agreement. If that was not the agreement, then the question resolves itself into one relating to the market value of the ships. In there also is a finding by Mr. Ramseyer, a member of the Commission, as to the nature of this agreement as these claimants understood it, that they were to have the operation of the ships or they would not have transferred them to the Government.

Finally the case was taken to the Court of Claims and the Court of Claims disposed of it on a memorandum drawn up by Mr. Denman and Mr. Herd and signed by Herd and Carden, and also by Phelps Brothers, the owners of the Austrian ships. That was nothing more than a memorandum to effect the transfer of the ships to the United States Government and did not undertake to set out the agreement between the Government and Herd and Carden; and Mr. Denman himself as found by the War Contract Adjustment Board said that that paper was nothing more than it appeared to be, a mere memorandum, and did not undertake to set out the agreement. That is why we want to go to the Supreme Court. We want the greatest tribunal of this Nation to check on these facts found by the War Contract Adjustment Board, found by Mr. Ramseyer, found by the Court of Claims and see what right an American has. The right to have a case reviewed by a superior court is an American right under our system of jurisprudence.

Mr. KELLER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WEAVER. I yield.

Mr. KELLER. And this bill simply gives them the right to appeal their case.

Mr. WEAVER. It gives them the right to appeal from a decision of the Court of Claims.

Mr. KELLER. Why should we not let that tribunal try the case rather than to try the case before the House?

Mr. WEAVER. That is exactly what the committee asks be done.

Mr. KEEFE. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WEAVER. I yield.

Mr. KEEFE. Did I understand the gentleman correctly when I understood him to say that the sum total of $6,778,000, which is the amount stipulated in the receipts given to the United States Government by Carden and Herd, included not only the purchase price agreed upon for the ships but three-hundred-thousand-odd dollars to take care of incidental damage and expense to which they had been put?

Mr. WEAVER. Yes; certain damages. I do not have the details.

Mr. KEEFE. So that there was a computation of the damages that these people had been put to up to that time.

Mr. WEAVER. No damages to the ships. They were to be paid back certain damages; yes.

Mr. KEEFE. It means something, at least.

Mr. JONKMAN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield for a question on that very point?

Mr. WEAVER. I yield.

Mr. JONKMAN. The question has been asked, What is the basis of the claim? I take it the basis of the claim is the fact that these men had agreed to take these ships at $123 a dead-weight ton and had agreed to sell them at a syndicate for $140 a dead-weight ton plus 5 percent of the gross earnings; that the Government took them over at $128 a dead-weight ton, thus turning a profit of $17 a ton into a net loss of $12, and refused to allow them to operate the ships.

Mr. WEAVER. The gentleman is absolutely right. There is no controversy whatever in this case as to the facts.

Mr. WEAVER. Mr. Chairman, I yield myself 2 additional minutes.

Now, Mr. Chairman, let me show you what you are asked to pass upon.

What do these claimants have that was not conjectural? As the gentleman said, they had a sale of these ships for $140 a ton. They had an agreement already executed to operate them for 5 percent of the gross receipts. The Government reached out its hand and took it from them; then when the Government itself took these ships over, as it did under an agreement, they thought they should operate them, but the Government refused to let them operate these ships. Why are they left out as no other concern in the World War was left out? Even the Germans were paid for their ships on a market-value basis.

Mr. COCHRAN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WEAVER. I yield to the gentleman from Missouri.

Mr. COCHRAN. The Government also sent 4,000,000 men to war to stop bullets? What did they get? Thirty dollars a month.

Mr. WEAVER. I conceive that has nothing to do with this case at all. I am asking for simple, elemental justice under the Constitution of our country, which says that no man's property shall be taken from him except by payment of adequate consideration.

Mr. ROBSION of Kentucky. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WEAVER. I yield to the gentleman from Kentucky.

Mr. ROBSION of Kentucky. In the sworn testimony of Mr. Denby, Chairman of the Shipping Board, he states that they had taken over German ships, Italian ships, and other ships, and he further states that in his opinion a very substantial award should be made to complainants since the Government applied a different rule in dealing with all the other shipowners. These are the only people that have been discriminated against.

Mr. WEAVER. The gentleman is absolutely correct in his statement as far as the evidence shows.

Mr. GUYER of Kansas. Mr. Chairman, I yield 4 minutes to the gentleman from New York [Mr. HANCOCK].

Mr. HANCOCK. Mr. Chairman, if we are going to pass any legislation at all for the benefit of these two claimants we ought to give them the simple right to file a writ of certiorari in the Supreme Court of the United States asking to be heard on appeal as other litigants must do. We are not justified in singling these men out for preferential treatment. But I am against even that because, as you will learn from the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. WALTER], there is a bill pending permitting the syndicate, the undisclosed principals of these two agents, the right to intervene and to become parties to the suit. If these men were agents, as I contend they were, they should not be permitted to benefit under secret contracts, and any profit to be derived from this transaction belongs to the principals unless the principals know their rights and waive them. They, the principals, are in here with a bill asking to be allowed to intervene and to protect their interests.

The question seems to revolve around the disputed fact as to the agency of Carden and Herd. These are the facts as I remember them: There were seven Austrian ships tied up in New York harbor early in 1917. These two men saw an opportunity to make some money by buying these ships at what amounted to a forced sale. It was known that Austria would soon be at war with the United States and that these ships would be seized, therefore the Austrian owners were willing to sell them for what they could get. Carden and Herd did not have enough money to buy the ships, they did not have enough money even to make the down payment. They went to some wealthy men in New York and formed a syndicate. These men gave their notes to Carden and Herd to finance the purchase. The proceeds were deposited in Herd's name and the money was paid by Herd's check out of the deposits which belonged to the members of the syndicate, though carried in Herd's name. There cannot be any doubt about that if the record is studied.

President Wilson learned these seven ships had been taken over by a New York syndicate and sent Mr. Baruch to New York to get title to the ships. Mr. Baruch's instructions were to allow no profiteering, but to pay only the original purchase price and expenses. That is what Mr. Baruch did. In his testimony he said he made no agreement to turn these ships over to Carden and Herd to be operated by them for 5 percent of the freight receipts. He said he could not have made any such agreement because he had no such authority. If such an agreement was made, which I dispute and which the Court of Claims held did not exist, the benefits would have accrued to the syndicate. That is good law.

If you believe that Carden and Herd were acting on their own, without the financial backing of the alleged principals, then this bill has some merit; but if you believe, as the facts will indicate, that they were acting as agents, then they have no claim at all.

Our friend from Kentucky dismisses the findings of the Court of Claims as a mere technicality. It found that the negotiations between Mr. Baruch, representing the Government, and the two men, having been carried on for some days and having resulted in a written agreement, there could be no valid agreement that was not contained in the written instrument. That is good law and that is the unanimous decision of the Court of Claims in this case.

You might be interested to know that this is the only private bill that ever got a rule for consideration in this way. It has had quite a long and checkered career and it has had a lot of pressure behind it. Last year a bill was introduced directing the Court of Claims to render judgment for these claimants according to a certain formula set out in the bill itself. Of course, the committee turned that down. Then we had a series of private bills on the Private Calendar and they were objected to. Now we have this bill before us under an unprecedented rule.

Mr. COSTELLO. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HANCOCK. I yield to the gentleman from California.

Mr. COSTELLO. Is this not the only private bill that has ever been handled by the Committee on the Judiciary?

Mr. HANCOCK. I am not sure as to that.

Mr. COSTELLO. I think there is no authority in the House Manual of Rules for this bill to be considered by the Judiciary Committee.

Mr. HANCOCK. This is the only private bill brought to the floor by special rule that I ever heard of.

Mr. WEAVER. Mr. Chairman, I yield 5 minutes to the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. McGRANERY].

Mr. McGRANERY. Mr. Chairman, I am very much in favor of the right of appeal. I believe that an appeal should be made as accessible as prudence dictates. But this is one of the most unusual bills that I have ever read in my life. This, as everyone knows, goes beyond any of the rules as now prescribed by the Supreme Court of the United States.

The Supreme Court entertains its appeal through certiorari. This bill tells the Supreme Court of the United States that it is to take this case and determine all questions of law and fact and in its judgment include the fair market value of the property involved. In other words, this bill practically directs the Supreme Court of the United States to receive and hear witnesses.

I do not know anything about the merits of this case, but there is something behind it that is not fair. There is something behind it that will not stand the test of God's sun. Right now in this very House is another bill pertaining to the same matter, the bill introduced by the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. WALTER], H. R. 8812. This bill asks that the parties named here get this money. This bill differs from the other bill, which came out of the Committee on the Judiciary. I do not know how they got the wires crossed, but here is a bill that this Congress should vote down and repudiate with such a vote that no one would dare come here again with any such hoodwinking proposition.

Mr. COCHRAN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. McGRANERY. I yield to the gentleman from Missouri.

Mr. COCHRAN. The gentleman speaks about this bill, but have you read the first bill introduced in the first session of this Congress which authorized and directed the Supreme Court of the United States to render judgment in favor of Carden and Herd?

Mr. McGRANERY. There is enough confusion existing in my mind already with these two bills. Here is the bill H. R. 7230, on which we are asked to vote. It is a bill which will turn this money over to the agents. The bill H. R. 8812 is a bill now pending in the Committee on Claims, asking that the people who put up this money have the right to intervene and go into the Court of Claims, and allow the Court of Claims to hear this case de novo. I may be all wrong about this, but on the merits, as appears from the face of the bill, and not going beyond it, this committee ought to vote it down.

Mr. MAY. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. McGRANERY. I yield to the gentleman from Kentucky.

Mr. MAY. I have no interest in the world in this matter and know very little about it except what I have read in connection with it and what I have heard in the debate this afternoon. However, the gentleman's statement has me confused a little. As I understand, the pending bill on which we are now called to vote, it merely authorizes an appeal to the Supreme Court and directs that Court upon the hearings to consider the record made in the Court of Claims, where the Government and the claimants had representation.

Mr. McGRANERY. It does no such thing. It authorizes the Supreme Court to determine the law and the facts first, and then to determine the fair market value of the property involved.

Mr. MAY. Will it not necessarily have to determine it on the record that was made in the Court of Claims, where both parties were represented by counsel?

Mr. McGRANERY. Why did this bill not come out of the committee authorizing the Supreme Court to entertain a writ of certiorari from the parties who now claim damage?

Mr. MAY. What would be the difference? The Supreme Court would try it on the record of the trial court.

Mr. McGRANERY. As I read this language, we direct the Supreme Court to receive and hear witnesses, because the Court cannot determine the question just on the record alone as it is written here. But the real complaint is that there are seven persons who have a bill now in the Committee on Claims asking for this money, and there are two persons who acted as their agents who are concerned in the bill now before the House. These agents, who acted for the other people, claim the money here. I asked the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. HALLECK], "Who gets this money, the claimants named in the bill?" and he said, "Yes." [Applause.]

Mr. GUYER of Kansas. Mr. Chairman, I yield 6 minutes to the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. TINKHAM].

Mr. TINKHAM. Mr. Chairman, the repeated disclaimers by the President and by Secretary Hull of United States participation and involvement in territorial and political affairs of Europe and Asia are utterly false. Their declarations of foreign policies are belied by the record. It is a shocking state of affairs, for certainly no form of government can long endure if its chief officials do not tell the truth. No government can long exist on continual falsification.

In a statement which President Roosevelt authorized his secretary to make on July 7 last it was asserted:

> There is an absence of any intention whatever on the part of this Government to interfere in any territorial problems in Europe or Asia.

Two days earlier, on July 5, Secretary of State Hull had said:

> The Government of the United States pursues a policy of nonparticipation and of noninvolvement in the purely political affairs of Europe.

He did not dare meet squarely the German challenge that the policy had been one of intervention.

The indelible record proves that the statements of both the President and the Secretary of State are deliberate falsehoods.

Here is the irrefutable record:

In 1935 President Roosevelt and Secretary of State Hull took provocative and hostile action in the Ethiopian war by attempting, without statutory authority, to embargo the shipment of oil to Italy. The Ethiopian war was a "territorial" and "political" dispute of European powers.

In October of 1937 President Roosevelt made his "quarantine speech" in which he asserted that there was no escape for the United States through mere isolation or neutrality, and that the "peace-loving nations must make a concerted effort" to quarantine and stop the aggressor nations. Yet, in fact, every question raised and every action taken by the so-called aggressor nations, Germany, Italy, and Japan, involved "territorial problems" and "political affairs" in Europe and Asia.

Beginning in 1938, the United States subsidized China in the Sino-Japanese war, in the same amounts in dollars and at the same times as Great Britain, in accordance with Secretary Hull's declared policy of "parallel action" with Great Britain. The Sino-Japanese war concerns a "territorial problem" and a "political affair" in Asia. Great Britain is a European and an Asiatic power.

In midsummer of 1938 President Roosevelt and Secretary Hull sent American officials to Czechoslovakia to support great Britain in the political crisis there which eventuated in the Munich settlement. This involved "territorial problems" in Europe and had to do with "political affairs" of Europe.

In a message to the Congress in January of 1939, President Roosevelt stated that whereas words were futile, there were many methods of bringing aggressor nations to account. This statement certainly was an implied threat to interfere in the "territorial problems" of Europe and Asia and to involve the United States in the "political affairs" of Europe and Asia.

A few weeks later President Roosevelt was reported to have said that America's first line of defense was in France. This statement was never satisfactorily denied. It was a positive assertion that the United States would interfere in the "territorial problems" and the "political affairs" of Europe.

In November last President Roosevelt and Secretary Hull authorized a large Government loan to Finland in its conflict with Russia and sanctioned shipment to Finland of United States airplanes built for our Government. The conflict between these two countries was based on ancient "territorial problems" and was a "political affair" of Europe.

President Roosevelt and Secretary Hull openly and aggressively supported Great Britain every step of the way and at every turn up to the moment of the actual declaration of war by Great Britain in September last, and have been continuing that support. The war in Europe is the result of "territorial problems" and is purely the "political affair" of Europe.

This entire record is in contravention of the traditional and basic policy of the United States of nonintervention in the political affairs of Europe and Asia.

In pursuing this course, President Roosevelt and Secretary Hull for their own political purposes have concealed and ignored a vital part of the Monroe Doctrine, to which they have repeatedly affirmed their allegiance.

The Monroe Doctrine consisted of two parts, one as vital as the other. The first part was that European powers were not to interfere in the Western Hemisphere, and the other part was that the Western Hemisphere was not to interfere with European powers or in the Eastern Hemisphere.

President Roosevelt and Secretary of State Hull by continually violating and suppressing the second part of the Monroe Doctrine, by interfering in the territorial problems of Europe and Asia and in the political affairs of Europe and Asia, have brought the United States to the brink of war in relation to both continents; and all this in flagrant disregard of the fundamentals of traditional American foreign policy. At last, events are catching up with them.

The foreign policy of President Roosevelt and Secretary of State Hull has been a complete repudiation of American traditional foreign policy. It has been dangerous and futile. It is now collapsing. They have sown the wind, and are about to reap the whirlwind. [Applause.]

Mr. GUYER of Kansas. Mr. Chairman, I yield 5 minutes to the gentleman from New York [Mr. TABER].

Mr. TABER. Mr. Chairman, I want to review briefly some of the facts that appear here, and call your attention to some of the situations that would be created by this bill if it should be adopted. As nearly as I can make out, a little time before the World War was entered by the United States, the Austrian owners of these ships were in a panic, and they approached these promoters, and the promoters arranged to pay them about $6,400,000. The promoters themselves organized a syndicate under which they were to get a little bit bigger price; that is, they were going to sell to a syndicate, of which they were members, the ships for a bigger price. Then we went into the war a couple of days after the transaction with the Austrians took place, and the ships were taken over by the United States Government. The claimants here Messrs. Carden and Herd, signed a receipt which I am going to read:

WASHINGTON, D. C., May 3, 1917.

Received from the United States of America the sum of $6,778,006.70 in payment for the steamers Dora, Ida, Erny, Teresa, Lucia, Anna, and Clara, of a total dead-weight carrying capacity of 52,561. Bills of sale for these vessels, together with certain agreements relative thereto, were executed and delivered to the United States of America. This receipt is without prejudice to the payment of the further sum of $20 per ton dead weight for the transfer of the said vessels free of restrictions in the trade thereof.

(Signed) GEORGE A. CARDEN.
(Signed) ANDERSON T. HERD.

Now, that is the story, the whole story, and nothing but the story, yet there is an attempt here to claim there was a hidden agreement somewhere by which these folks were to operate the ships on a basis of 5 percent of the gross receipts. There is not any evidence that these ships would have produced any amount of money, but I understand that these folks are claiming something like $16,000,000 there, and that there are lobbyists galore working for this bill. I think it is about time we did our own business and I believe the time has come when it should not be run by lobbyists.

Mr. WEAVER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. TABER. In a moment.

The bill itself is bad, and the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. MCGRANERY] has described a great many of the bad features, but the worst of them is this. As I understand it, they had a right to take an appeal to the circuit court of appeals and did not do so. I may be wrong on that, but that is what appears. President Roosevelt, in a veto message the other day, said:

The first proviso of the bill would permit a review by the Supreme Court on certiorari of any decision or judgment rendered in any suit filed under the authority of the act. This clause is subject to the construction that an application for a writ of certiorari may be made directly to the Supreme Court to review a judgment of the district court without an intermediate appeal to the circuit court of appeals. No reason is discernible for making such an exception from the usual procedure in this instance. It may be observed that it is not customary to include such a provision in private jurisdictional bills in which jurisdiction is conferred on a United States district court in respect to an individual claim.

Mr. GUYER of Kansas. Mr. Chairman, I yield 10 minutes to the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. ROBSION].

Mr. ROBSION of Kentucky. Mr. Chairman, our friend from Pennsylvania, Mr. MCGRANERY, and our friend from New York, Mr. TABER, and one or two others, including the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. COCHRAN], evidently have made no study of this case. I am sure my friend from New York looked over it only this afternoon for a few moments, and I wonder how far the gentleman from Pennsylvania has gone in the study of it. There is much of misinformation and misunderstanding about this situation. For instance my friend from Pennsylvania says there is a syndicate involved in this. In these hearings are releases, receipts, and records from the syndicate, showing that it was closed up in May 1917, and it is only within a year or so that certain lawyers here in Washington thought they had found a mare's nest, and they dug up one or two of the heirs of these men that were in the syndicate, and they now make claim and appeared before our Committee on the Judiciary. We heard it all and decided that they had no claim or right in this matter, and then they went before the Committee on Claims of this House and I am informed that the Claims Committee turned down or at least tabled their claim. Why should anyone muddy the waters of this honest claim with things like that? Then they bring in here the $20 of clearance charges and refer to the operation of these ships between the United States and Europe. These people did not want to operate them between the United States and Europe, but they wanted to operate them between the United States and South America.

It was after the Government took them over that the Government paid that $20 to the Austrian Government for that purpose, and that was before we were in war. That has never been charged to these people at all, and my friend from Missouri [Mr. COCHRAN] said the Government paid these people $20 a ton to operate these ships between Europe and the United States. This record shows by uncontradicted evidence that after you have counted up everything the Government has paid to Carden and Herd, they are still short something like $400,000 in cash and in addition to that the Government denied them their contract right to operate the ships for 5 percent. Why would Carden and Herd surrender their right with this syndicate for $140 a ton and accept $128 a ton and why would they surrender their rights to 5 percent for operating with the syndicate and then get no right to operate? Read the testimony of Mr. Denman, the chairman of the Shipping Board, and of Barney Baruch. Mr. Baruch said, of course, Carden and Herd understood that they were to have the right to operate these ships.

Mr. PATRICK. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. ROBSION of Kentucky. Briefly.

Mr. PATRICK. I want to vote for this bill if I can, but I cannot understand from the gentleman's statement why it is necessary to include in the bill the language "including the fair market value of the property involved."

Mr. ROBSION of Kentucky. I am going to accept the amendment of the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. SCHAFER]. All we want to do here is give the Supreme Court the right to review this case on the law and facts on the record made in the Court of Claims and nothing more. We do not ask for any more.

Mr. MAY. Is not that all this bill does?

Mr. ROBSION of Kentucky. I think that is all it does, but the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. SCHAFER] and others think it goes further than that, and I agree with the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. SCHAFER]. We do not want to go any further than that. No two men were ever treated worse than were Carden and Herd. Read Mr. Denman's statement, in which he said that one of the reasons he regretted leaving the Shipping Board when he did was he had not had an opportunity to clear up and do the right thing by Carden and Herd. Mr. Denman says that in his own statement, and you can read it in the record that these men were treated differently from any other shipowners whose ships were taken over. The Government got these ships at almost half their market value. The War Industries Board and Mr. Ramseyer found and all of the experts testified that the real value of the ships, the minimum value, was $225 a ton, ranging up to $300 a ton. Now, after the Government got the ships at one-half of their value and turned a part of them over to the Allies and one or two were sunk in the war, those that were not sunk after the war this great Government of the United States sold for $150 a ton on an average. Now, what kind of treatment is that to hand out to one of its own citizens? We are not asking any money here. All we are asking is to go to the Supreme Court and let it decide the matter, and they will not sit down with just a scrap of the record and decide the case as some of you have done today. It took months to try this case out. Look into the record. I challenge anybody to deny the proposition, beginning with President Wilson, then on down with Barney Baruch and Mr. Denman and the War Claims Board and Mr. Weeks, everyone, including the Senate committee twice, the Judiciary Committee of the House twice; I challenge anyone to find one who knows the record who takes the position that some of our friends do here today.

They all admit that Carden and Herd have got a just claim. They were thrown out of the Court of Claims on a technicality. Now, the only proposition is they say, "Let us go to the Supreme Court and let the Supreme Court decide." What is the technicality? Some of my friends talk about the law. They are wrong about the law. It has always been proper in every jurisdiction to show by outside testimony what the real consideration was. Of course, when these Austrians were turning the ships over to our Government they had no interest in operating the ships or the making of any contract, and hence this memorandum of closing or passing title did not contain any operating provisions, but here are written records that show that Mr. Baruch and Mr. Denman and others said, "According to the contract heretofore entered into." What was the contract "heretofore entered into"? To take $128 a ton for the ships and then to have 5 percent for operating the ships. That is what it was. This claim is fair and just.

Someone raised the question, "Is this House going to try this case this afternoon?" We are not asking the House to try it. We are merely asking that the case go to the Supreme Court with the whole record before them. There is no $16,000,000 involved anywhere; not at all. If Mr. Ramseyer's valuation is accepted, the amount involved is about two and one-half millions. That is as much out of line as some of the other statements.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Kentucky has expired.

Mr. WEAVER. Mr. Chairman, I yield the balance of my time to the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. HEALEY].

Mr. HEALEY. Mr. Chairman, it seems to me we have spent the 1 hour allotted for debate on this legislation in an attempt to try this case in the House of Representatives. I submit that the considerations underlying this whole case are very technical and complicated. It seems to me unnecessary to say that we cannot possibly hope in the time that is given to us here to try this case fairly and justly, nor is that asked in this legislation that is before us. This bill carries no authorization, no appropriation of funds. It merely confers on these claimants their inherent right of a day in court.

Now, this case was before the Court of Claims and it was decided adversely to these claimants on two grounds. I submit that those were technical grounds—legal grounds. Undoubtedly there may be some difference of opinion among legal minds as to whether or not the Court of Claims arrived at the proper conclusions of law on the facts in this case or whether it erred in its judgment. All that this legislation does is to give these claimants, who have been fighting this case for many years and who have spent a great deal of money trying to prosecute their claim, the right to go to the highest tribunal in the land and have that Court pass on the law and the facts involved in the case. That is all you do with this legislation. If the Supreme Court decides against them they will have to bear the costs. I think we can depend on the Supreme Court of the United States to protect the rights and equities of the claimants as well as to protect the rights of the Government.

Mr. COCHRAN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HEALEY. I yield.

Mr. COCHRAN. The gentleman says this carries no appropriation. That is true, but the Court of Claims said in 1938 that over $16,000,000 was involved, and they are likely to be back here asking for $16,000,000.

Mr. HEALEY. I do not agree with the gentleman that there is that amount involved. However, that question is not involved in this legislation. That is a matter for the Court to decide.

Mr. COCHRAN. Here it is. Read it.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Massachusetts has expired.

All time has expired. The Clerk will read the bill.

The Clerk read as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That George A. Carden and Anderson T. Herd, or their legal representatives may, at any time within — months after the date of the enactment of this act, appeal as of right to the Supreme Court of the United States from the judgment of the Court of Claims of the United States in the suit No. 42711 heretofore instituted in the Court of Claims by George A. Carden and Anderson T. Herd, and jurisdiction is hereby conferred upon the Supreme Court to consider on such appeal all questions of law and fact, including the fair market value of the property involved. Any judgment rendered in favor of the claimants shall be paid in the same manner as other judgments of said Court of Claims are paid.

With the following committee amendment:

Page 1, line 4, after the word "within", insert the word "six."

The committee amendment was agreed to.

Mr. WALTER. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment.

Mr. SCHAFER of Wisconsin. Mr. Chairman, a parliamentary inquiry.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. SCHAFER of Wisconsin. What was the committee amendment? The bill I have before me shows no committee amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. For the information of the committee the Clerk will again report the committee amendment.

The Clerk again reported the committee amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The committee amendment has already been agreed to.

The gentleman from Pennsylvania offers an amendment which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. WALTER: Page 1, after the enacting clause, strike out the remainder of the bill and insert in lieu thereof the following:

"That jurisdiction is hereby conferred upon the Court of Claims of the United States, notwithstanding any lapse of time or statute of limitation, to hear, determine, and render judgment upon the claim or claims of any person or persons, or their legal representative or representatives, if deceased, who were, on or about May 3, 1917, the true and equitable owner or owners of a contract to purchase the following Austrian merchant vessels: Erny, Lucia, Anna, Teresa, Clara, Ida, and Dora, as if such contract had been requisitioned or expropriated by the United States under the provisions of the Emergency Shipping Act of 1917: Provided, That the amount of the judgment, if any, shall be limited to the difference between the true market value of the vessels and the amount paid by the United States when it acquired such contract.

"SEC. 2. In the event that the Court of Claims finds a judgment for the claimant or claimants and finds that more than one person is entitled to share in the amount so found payable, it shall determine the share that each of said persons, or their legal representative or representatives, if deceased, is entitled to and enter judgment accordingly.

"SEC. 3. Separate suits may be maintained with respect to any of such claims, but no suit shall be brought after the expiration of 1 year from the enactment of this act.

"SEC. 4. The record in the suit, entitled 'George A. Carden et al. against the United States (No. 42711), heretofore instituted in the Court of Claims, pursuant to an act of Congress (Private, No. 233, 73d Cong.); and the evidence there taken, together with the exhibits therein offered, may be introduced before the Court of Claims, in any suit or suits, proceeding or proceedings, under this act, with the full force of depositions, subject to objection as to competency and relevancy.

"SEC. 5. Any party to any suit or suits, proceeding or proceedings brought pursuant to the provisions of this act may, at any time within 6 months after the entry of a final judgment in the said suit or suits, proceeding or proceedings, by the said Court of Claims of the United States, appeal as of right to the Supreme Court of the United States, and jurisdiction is hereby conferred upon the Supreme Court to consider on such appeal or appeals, all questions of law and fact, including the fair market value of the property involved."

Mr. WEAVER. Mr. Chairman, I make a point of order against the amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. WEAVER. Mr. Chairman, the bill H. R. 7230 very clearly deals with a situation relating to Messrs. Carden and Herd growing out of a transaction referred to therein. The bill offered by the gentleman from Pennsylvania as an amendment undertakes the substitution of entirely new language, bringing other persons unknown to us into the picture and conferring jurisdiction on another court. It is entirely new legislation from beginning to end and is not germane to the bill.

Mr. SCHAFER of Wisconsin. Mr. Chairman, I make a further point of order.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. SCHAFER of Wisconsin. The bill pending before the House provides for an appeal to the Supreme Court of the United States in the case of George A. Carden and Anderson T. Herd. The substitute ignores the Supreme Court and provides for the institution of a new case by a new set of claimants in the Court of Claims. Clearly it is not germane to the pending bill.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Pennsylvania desire to be heard upon the point of order?

Mr. WALTER. Yes, Mr. Chairman.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will hear the gentleman briefly.

Mr. WALTER. Mr. Chairman, while the amendment I offered does permit additional parties to have a day in court, nevertheless it does not affect the parties who are mentioned in the original bill. Under the amendment the Court of Claims has the right to permit parties other than Carden and Herd to intervene in order that a complete record may be submitted to the Supreme Court so that the Supreme Court in its determination of the liability of the United States to reimburse anyone may find who in fact is entitled to recover, if anyone is entitled to recover. I submit that the amendment is germane because the rights of Carden and Herd are in no way affected, if they have any right at the present time.

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. LUTHER A. JOHNSON). The Chair is ready to rule.

Under the rules of the House one fundamental proposition is controlling: One individual proposition may not be amended by another individual proposition even though the two may belong to the same class.

The bill under consideration, H. R. 7230, relates merely to one claim, that of George A. Carden and Anderson T. Herd. The bill confers upon these claimants the right to take their case from the Court of Claims to the Supreme Court of the United States. The amendment offered by the gentleman from Pennsylvania covers a number of other parties in other claims who it does not appear are in any way related to the pending bill.

The point of order is sustained.

Mr. SCHAFER of Wisconsin. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. SCHAFER of Wisconsin: On page 2, strike out all of line 6. Also strike out the comma at the end of line 5 and insert a period in lieu thereof.

Mr. SCHAFER of Wisconsin. Mr. Chairman, I shall be brief because the hour is late.

This is a perfecting amendment. If this amendment is adopted the bill will carry out the purpose of its sponsors. They say the bill proposes merely that the Supreme Court shall review all questions of law and fact which were considered by the Court of Claims.

If this amendment is adopted I believe that not very many Members of the House will object to the bill, for certainly we can trust the United States Supreme Court as now constituted to make this review of all questions of law and fact on appeal. I do not care to enter into a discussion of the merits of the bill because the question involved is merely that of the right to appeal to the Supreme Court of the United States on the questions of law and facts. I hope my perfecting amendment will be adopted by an almost unanimous vote so that we can speed action to complete the consideration of this bill so that we can adjourn this day's session in order that we might take care of other important problems which are pending in our offices.

Mr. ROBSION of Kentucky. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SCHAFER of Wisconsin. I yield to the author of the bill, the very distinguished and able gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. ROBSION].

Mr. ROBSION of Kentucky. I have consulted with the chairman and the gentlemen in charge of the bill. The amendment is entirely satisfactory to me, and I assume it is to those who are in favor of the bill.

Mr. SCHAFER of Wisconsin. I am very glad that the gentleman believes the amendment is satisfactory. I feel confident that with the bill perfected by my amendment many Members of the House will vote for the gentleman's bill who would otherwise oppose it. [Applause.]

Mr. WALTER. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word.

Mr. Chairman, I did not anticipate that anyone would make a point of order against the amendment I offered, and for that reason I did not speak on this bill during general debate.

Mr. Chairman, this measure has been pending in the Congress for a good many years. Hearings have been held in both this body and the other body on numerous occasions, and on numerous phases of the claims of the people who purchased these seven Austrian vessels. In all of the hearings, however, one fact is not in dispute; namely, that the $730,000 down payment for these seven Austrian vessels was made by a syndicate, and that not a dime of it was put up by either Carden or Herd. Let me call attention to the testimony in support of the bill under consideration. I refer first to the testimony of Mr. Osborn, a man who represented this syndicate:

Mr. OSBORN. Of course, we have this feeling, that the evidence we introduced strengthens the merits of this claim, because it makes it clearer than ever before that these boats were not willingly surrendered. They were surrendered because the Government simply said we are going to take those boats; it is our policy to pay nobody profits, and on that basis we were prepared to surrender the boats, but apparently the Government changed its policy with respect to that, and that is why we are here.

Mr. WEAVER. Then it will be understood that you will furnish this memorandum within the shortest time possible, not exceeding a week.

Mr. OSBORN. In a week from today, and we will try to expedite it.

Mr. Chairman, we agree, of course, entirely that this claim is an equitable one and that it has never been finally determined. The whole question, in our minds, turns on one group of facts; what the Government acquired was a contract to buy the boats from the Austrians. Whose contract was it? The case proceeded for 22 years on the basis that Mr. Herd and Mr. Carden effected an abrogation or rescission with the syndicate. The evidence which we will introduce and put before you gentlemen in the most convincing way indicates, to our minds, without any question of doubt, that what the Government acquired was this syndicate contract to buy these boats, and, as Mr. Herd said, he acted as the conduit of title.

There is no dispute as to that. The down payment of $730,000 was made by this syndicate of seven people and the contract was their contract, not the contract of Carden and Herd; and if anybody is entitled to recover, it is the men who put up the money, the undisclosed principals in this matter, not the people who were merely the conduits of title according to their own admission.

During the period of time this bill has been in our committee, I was impressed by the fact that somebody was entitled to recover and with that thought in mind and with that thought only in mind I introduced a bill which is now pending before the Claims Committee. Under that bill, which was offered as an amendment a few moments ago, the Court of Claims has the right, the power, and the jurisdiction to pass on the question, first, Is anyone entitled to recover? and, secondly, Who is entitled to recover? The entire record may be reviewed, including the facts that were reviewed before by the Supreme Court of the United States. We will then do what the proponents of the bill have urged, namely, that the parties be given their day in court and, as the distinguished gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. ROBSION] said a while ago, "We will go to the Court on the whole record."

The thing to do is to vote this bill down so that the Congress may consider the entire proposition in a proper manner.

Mr. ROBSION of Kentucky. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WALTER. I yield to the gentleman from Kentucky.

Mr. ROBSION of Kentucky. The gentleman has a bill before the Claims Committee, but did not the Claims Committee table the bill?

Mr. WALTER. No; the Claims Committee has not tabled the bill. The Claims Committee has not acted on the bill up to this time, and I might say that the reason why the subcommittee of the Claims Committee has not acted on my bill is because we were all under the impression that the amendment I would offer to this bill when the rule was secured would be held germane and the House could then consider the entire proposition.

Let me point out one thing to the gentleman from Kentucky in this whole matter. The Supreme Court can only pass on one question and that is whether or not certain evidence was properly excluded by the Court of Claims. If the Supreme Court overrules the Court of Claims on that question the claim will then be remanded to the Court of Claims with instructions to receive that particular testimony. If that testimony goes into the record Carden and Herd will recover and nobody else will ever have an opportunity to recover despite the fact they put up all of this money while Carden and Herd did not put up a dime.

Mr. COCHRAN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WALTER. I yield to the gentleman from Missouri.

Mr. COCHRAN. Is it not a fact that Carden and Herd already have collected $738,000 and have kept that and that is evidence of the fact that they will keep whatever they get out of this bill?

Mr. WALTER. There is no doubt about that. If the case goes to the Supreme Court the record will be in such shape that Carden and Herd are the only people whose claims can be heard.

Mr. ROBSION of Kentucky. Does the gentleman claim that Carden and Herd received $730,000?

Mr. WALTER. They collected $750,000.

Mr. COCHRAN. Seven hundred and thirty-eight thousand dollars is correct. They did not give a cent to the syndicate.

Mr. ROBSION of Kentucky. Mr. Chairman, I rise in opposition to the pro forma amendment.

Mr. SCHAFER of Wisconsin. Mr. Chairman, a parliamentary inquiry. My amendment is decidedly not a pro forma amendment and it is pending.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman's amendment is still pending.

Mr. COCHRAN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. ROBSION of Kentucky. I do not yield.

Mr. COCHRAN. If the gentleman is in doubt, I can enlighten him.

Mr. ROBSION of Kentucky. The gentleman does not have to settle questions for me. I know more about this case than the gentleman from Missouri.

Mr. COCHRAN. The gentleman only imagines he does.

Mr. ROBSION of Kentucky. It is a very healthy imagination, because after I studied this case I decided it was just and to be for it and the gentleman from Missouri was for it and wrote a letter to that effect, I understand.

Mr. COCHRAN. I admitted that a few moments ago, but I found out I was wrong, and I had sense enough to change my mind.

Mr. ROBSION of Kentucky. The gentleman was right then and is wrong now.

Mr. Chairman, I cannot understand why it is contended here that Carden and Herd did not put up any money. Carden and Herd were well-to-do men in their own right. They were prominent, important businessmen. The only thing that these folks who went into the syndicate did was to give Carden and Herd their negotiable notes for down payment, less than 10 percent. Carden and Herd discounted the note in the bank, which is a perfectly legitimate transaction. Carden and Herd were behind the note. After the Government objected to making a deal with the syndicate and the syndicate was dissolved Carden and Herd took up the note, and that settled the matter. Mr. Speer, representing these syndicate members, closed up the matter, gave written statement, and the syndicate was disssolved. These men got out and Carden and Herd paid the note and took it up.

Mr. SUMNERS of Texas. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. ROBSION of Kentucky. I yield to the gentleman from Texas.

Mr. SUMNERS of Texas. Is that the $750,000 which these gentlemen have just told the House Carden and Herd put in their own pockets?

Mr. ROBSION of Kentucky. There is no $750,000 in it. I do not know which one they are talking about. Mr. Heckscher was one of the seven of the syndicate. He paid in $105,000 in cash. After this syndicate was set aside Mr. Herd gave to Mr. Heckscher his check for $105,000 with interest at the rate of 6 percent from the very minute he put in the money. Mr. Heckscher demanded his money back as a member of the syndicate. The gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. WALTER] has talked about these folks coming in here. He recently introduced a bill for them. The gentleman states this matter has been up for a number of years. You never heard of one of these syndicate men until some Washington lawyers and some folks up in New York brought the matter in here in the last year, after Carden and Herd had fought over this matter for 20 years. Then for the first time certain fellows thought they had found a mare's nest and came in here and had a bill introduced. Our committee heard them. It did not allow them anything. It did not think they had any place in this matter. Then they went before the Committee on Claims, and that committee has not allowed them anything.

Mr. WALTER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. ROBSION of Kentucky. I yield to the gentleman from Pennsylvania.

Mr. WALTER. The gentleman stated I had not heard anything about it until some Washington lawyers became interested in it.

Mr. ROBSION of Kentucky. I said also some folks in New York.

Mr. WALTER. Let me tell the gentleman that Mr. Pyne has been a friend of mine for a great many years. He discussed this matter with me at the time Representative Bacon introduced a measure to be of assistance to this syndicate, 5 years ago.

Mr. ROBSION of Kentucky. Mr. Speer, Mr. Pyne's representative in this syndicate, wrote Mr. Pyne a letter on May 17, 1917, telling him what? That he had followed his suggestions and the whole matter had been closed up, and the syndicate had been closed out. Mr. Pyne is not living now, is he?

Mr. WALTER. Oh, yes.

Mr. ROBSION of Kentucky. You see his letter right here in the record, do you not?

Mr. WALTER. He appeared before the committee. The gentleman did not mention the fact that he testified.

Mr. COX. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. ROBSION of Kentucky. I yield to the gentleman from Georgia.

Mr. COX. It might be well to state that had not the Government entered into this contract with Carden and Herd it would have taken these ships as alien ships under the law passed 6 weeks later, and then the Government would have had to pay the market value of the ships and in addition would have been compelled to return the ships at the expiration of the war.

Mr. ROBSION of Kentucky. That is what the Government did with every other person, even enemy aliens. Carden and Herd were offered $14,000,000 for the boats. They took less than half because of right to operate the boats.

Mr. COX. In other words, the Government has saved something in the neighborhood of $20,000,000 by reason of this transaction.

Mr. ROBSION of Kentucky. At least that.

Mr. SUMNERS of Texas. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last three words.

Mr. Chairman, I want to make a very brief statement. This matter was examined by the Committee on the Judiciary last year when I was just getting out of the hospital. I am not very familiar with the details but I have some familiarity with this matter.

Carden and Herd have been coming before the Committee on the Judiciary for 20 years. I never heard of this syndicate until this year, when it looked as if Carden and Herd might be getting somewhere within striking distance of action. That is the first time I ever heard of the syndicate having a claim. When these people began to come to the Committee on the Judiciary they were like most other people who feel they have a claim, they wanted to get from the Committee on the Judiciary just as short a cut as they could get to this money. The Committee on the Judiciary would not agree to that. But the Committee on the Judiciary did agree, however, believing that they had something that ought to be adjudicated, to help them get to the Supreme Court on the law and on the facts. That is what this bill proposes and that is all this bill proposes. These controversial details cannot be settled here. The Committee on the Judiciary, recognizing that they are matters for court determination, brought in this bill to send them to the place where they could be judicially settled.

Mr. CHURCH. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SUMNERS of Texas. I yield to the gentleman from Illinois.

Mr. CHURCH. If Carden and Herd get their benefits in the Supreme Court, will not the other members of the syndicate have rights against them?

Mr. SUMNERS of Texas. I believe there may be a possibility for them to proceed against Carden and Herd, but I do not want to go into that feature.

Mr. WALTER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SUMNERS of Texas. I yield to the gentleman from Pennsylvania.

Mr. WALTER. The syndicate could not proceed against Carden and Herd because the statute of limitations has tolled.

Mr. SUMNERS of Texas. I do not feel myself disposed to try to take care of the interests of people in New York who have good lawyers and who have slept for 20 years on their rights if they ever had any. This is not the place to try that matter.

Mr. McGRANERY. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SUMNERS of Texas. No; I cannot yield.

Mr. HANCOCK. Mr. Chairman, I rise in opposition to the pro forma amendment.

Mr. Chairman, I simply want to say that although the amendment offered by the gentleman from Wisconsin will improve the bill, it will still be bad and ought not to pass. It gives preference to two litigants. It gives them a right which no other litigants have.

Mr. McGRANERY. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HANCOCK. I yield.

Mr. McGRANERY. I was going to ask the distinguished chairman of the Committee on the Judiciary, for whom I have a very high regard, this question, but inasmuch as the gentleman from New York is a member of the Committee on the Judiciary I suppose he can answer it. How many claims bills has the Committee on the Judiciary entertained, in the gentleman's experience?

Mr. HANCOCK. Never a claims bill, but we occasionally do have jurisdictional bills.

Mr. McGRANERY. This is the first one?

Mr. HANCOCK. I believe we have conferred jurisdiction in a few cases, but it is very unusual. Ordinarily and properly bills involving claims against the Government go to the Committee on Claims.

Let me point out just this one other fact, because I want you all to have it clearly in mind. The claimants here are not suing to recover any loss or any out-of-pocket expense. They are asking for an additional speculative profit, which now amounts to $16,000,000, according to the unanimous opinion of the Court of Claims, on a war contract made in 1917. In a week or two we are going to pass a tax bill to stop profiteering in the next war. And yet, here we are today considering a profiteering claim of the war of 1917 amounting to $16,000,000. These claimants got every penny back they ever put into it, and they have been well paid for their brokerage fees and for their time, effort, and expense. They made a profit of $738,000, and yet they and their attorneys are back here today asking for $16,000,000 more.

Mr. SUMNERS of Texas. Will my friend the gentleman from New York yield?

Mr. HANCOCK. I am glad to yield to the gentleman from Texas.

Mr. SUMNERS of Texas. As I understood the gentleman from New York, his statement is to the effect that these claimants are back here now asking for $16,000,000?

Mr. HANCOCK. The Court of Claims says that is what it amounts to.

Mr. SUMNERS of Texas. Is not the truth that they are asking for an opportunity to litigate these questions in issue before the Supreme Court of the United States?

Mr. HANCOCK. In the fond hope that the Supreme Court will send the case back to the Court of Claims with instructions favorable to the claimants. It is a long shot and I imagine the lawyers have the case on a 50-percent contingent basis or even better. In my judgment, the claim is without merit in law or equity, and it was so held by the Attorney General and by the Court of Claims.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. SCHAFER].

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. COCHRAN. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. COCHRAN: On page 2, line 9, strike out the period, insert a colon and the following: "Provided, That no interest shall be included in the judgment rendered by the court."

Mr COCHRAN. Mr. Chairman, I am reading from the opinion of the Court of Claims delivered by Judge Green, who was chairman of the Ways and Means Committee of this House at the time he was appointed a member of that court. Judge Green says in the first paragraph:

The plaintiffs—speaking of Carden and Herd—in this case seek to recover $7,161,018.30 with interest from May 3, 1917, or a total of about $16,000,000.

That is as of May 2, 1938, so by the time this decision is finally rendered you will find the amount will be up to $20,000,000 if it is in favor of the plaintiff.

Mr. WEAVER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. COCHRAN. I yield.

Mr. WEAVER. Mr. Chairman, as far as the committee is concerned, we will be glad to accept the amendment.

Mr. COCHRAN. I am very pleased to have the gentleman say that and with that assurance, I will sit down.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Missouri.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. HOBBS. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word.

Mr. Chairman, I have no knowledge of the facts on which this claim is founded. I do not know that claimants are entitled to a cent. But I believe they are entitled to an appeal from the technical decision of the Court of Claims, so that their case may be heard and determined on its merit, if any it has. If without merit, the Supreme Court will so adjudge, and they will get nothing. My thought is that we should leave the administration of justice to the courts. I rise, therefore, not to argue the merits of the case, but to keep the record straight.

Two statements made in this debate seem to reflect upon the Committee on the Judiciary.

I understood the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. COCHRAN] to say, "May I say to the gentleman from Georgia that he cannot lay hands on a piece of legislation giving direct appeal to the United States Supreme Court from the Committee on the Judiciary in this House." I will ask the gentleman from Missouri if he did not make that statement.

Mr. COCHRAN. I did, and I was asking for the information and if the gentleman has it, I would like to have it.

Mr. HOBBS. I certainly have, and if I had not I would not have risen. I can give you the citation to the act. It is Private No. 69, Seventy-third Congress (S. 1091). I read the act:

An act conferring jurisdiction upon the Court of Claims of the United States to hear, consider, and render judgment on the claims of Edward F. Goltra against the United States arising out of the taking of certain vessels and unloading apparatus.

Be it enacted, etc., That jurisdiction is hereby conferred upon the Court of Claims of the United States, whose duty it shall be, notwithstanding the lapse of time or the bar of any statute of limitations or previous court decisions, to hear, consider, and render judgment on the claims of Edward F. Goltra against the United States for just compensation to him for certain vessels and unloading apparatus taken, whether tortiously or not, on March 25, 1923, by the United States under orders of the Acting Secretary of War, for the use and benefit of the United States; and any other legal or equitable claims arising out of the transactions in connection therewith: Provided, That separate suits may be brought with respect to the vessels and the unloading apparatus, but no suit shall be brought after the expiration of 1 year from the effective date of this Act: Provided further, That either party may appeal as of right to the Supreme Court of the United States from any judgment in said case at any time within 90 days after the rendition thereof, and any judgment rendered in favor of the claimant shall be paid in the same manner as other judgments of said Court of Claims are paid.

Approved, April 18, 1934.

The appeal authorized by that act is now pending in the Supreme Court of the United States.

Mr. COCHRAN. Did not that go up on a writ of certiorari?

Mr. HOBBS. It did not; it went up by appeal.

Mr. COCHRAN. I know all about the case as the man is from St. Louis.

Mr. HOBBS. Then the gentleman should have known better than to state——

Mr. COCHRAN. I did not know that that bill provided for a direct appeal.

Mr. HOBBS. It certainly does.

Mr. COCHRAN. I recall that a gentleman from Tennessee, I think Mr. Bachman, handled that bill on the floor of the House here.

Mr. HOBBS. The act provides that either party may appeal as of right to the Supreme Court of the United States.

Mr. COCHRAN. I stand corrected.

Mr. HOBBS. I thank the gentleman. There is another very dear friend of mine, the gentleman from New York [Mr. TABER], who made a statement which I think is in error. He said that claimants have a right of appeal from the Court of Claims to the circuit court of appeals. I may be wrong about it, but I know that the law reads that no other review is permitted than that which section 288 provides, as follows:

SEC. 288. Claims: No other review allowed. (a) In any case in the Court of Claims, including those begun under section 287 of this title, that court at any time may certify to the Supreme Court any definite and distinct questions of law concerning which instructions are desired for the proper disposition of the cause; and thereupon the Supreme Court may give appropriate instructions on the questions certified and transmit the same to the Court of Claims for its guidance in the further progress of the case.

(b) In any case in the Court of Claims, including those begun under section 287, it shall be competent for the Supreme Court, upon the petition of either party, whether Government or claimant, to require by certiorari that the cause, including the findings of fact and the judgment or decree, but omitting the evidence, may be certified to it for review and determination with the same power and authority, and with like effect, as if the cause had been brought there by appeal.

(c) All judgments and decrees of the Court of Claims shall be subject to review by the Supreme Court as provided in this section, and not otherwise (Feb. 13, 1925, c. 229, p. 3, 43 Stat. 939).

I have the highest regard for the distinguished gentleman from New York, and for any statement he makes, but I think he is mistaken when he says anyone can appeal from a decision of the Court of Claims. My opinion is that there is no appeal from any decision of the Court of Claims to the circuit court of appeals known to the law. Nor is there any appeal, unless authorized by some special act such as this bill, from the Court of Claims to any other court. There was no right of review except by writ of certiorari issued by the Supreme Court of the United States directed to the Court of Claims. This right of review by certiorari was provided by section 288 of the United States Judicial Code, which I have just read. But please permit me to call your attention to the fact that this section 288 authorizes only a limited right of review. There are provided only two ways: First, the Supreme Court may answer "questions of law concerning which instructions are desired" when certified by the Court of Claims; second, the Supreme Court may require by certiorari the Court of Claims to certify to it "the cause, including the findings of fact and the judgment or decree, but omitting the evidence, * * *."

That was the law when the case of Carden and Herd was decided by the Court of Claims. That was the only way of review open to Carden and Herd. And it was utterly worthless to them, for only by a consideration of the evidence by the Supreme Court could they even hope for a reversal of the adverse decision of the Court of Claims.

This law was so manifestly unfair that the then Attorney General of the United States had a bill drafted to cure the evil of requiring decisions by the Supreme Court without opportunity to consider the evidence in the cases. I quote his letter:

DECEMBER 30, 1938.

Hon. HENRY F. ASHURST,
Chairman, Committee on the Judiciary,
United States Senate.

MY DEAR SENATOR: I recommend legislation to amend the law regulating the contents of records in cases reviewed by the Supreme Court on certiorari to the Court of Claims.

Under existing law, judgments of the Court of Claims may be reviewed by the Supreme Court on certiorari. In such cases, if a writ of certiorari is granted, the record certified by the Court of Claims to the Supreme Court consists solely of the findings of fact and the judgment or decree, but omits the evidence. This is expressly provided by statute (act of Feb. 13, 1925, sec. 3, subsec. (b); 43 Stat. 936, 939; U. S. C., title 28, sec. 288 (b)).

On the other hand, the records in cases in which the Supreme Court reviews on certiorari the decisions of the circuit courts of appeals or of the United States Court of Appeals for the District of Columbia include the pertinent portions of the evidence as well as the findings. In such cases the Supreme Court has before it the entire record that was filed in the court below.

There does not appear to be any sufficient reason for this distinction between cases that proceed to the Supreme Court from the circuit courts of appeals and those that involve judgments of the Court of Claims. Moreover, the present practice in Court of Claims cases at times results in inability to present to the Supreme Court certain questions of law, such as whether or not the findings are sustained by the evidence.

In a recent patent case brought against the Government in the Court of Claims, in which the patent was held valid and infringed, a writ of certiorari was granted by the Supreme Court on the application of the Government. The application was based principally on the fact that the same patent had previously been held invalid and not infringed in another case in the Circuit Court of Appeals for the Second Circuit. The Supreme Court, however, after hearing the case on the merits, held that it was not in a position to review the validity of the patent, and its infringement, because of the fact that the record before it did not contain any of the evidence taken before the Court of Claims (United States v. Esnault-Pelterie, 303 U. S. 26).

Legislation appears desirable to amend the law so as to permit material portions of the evidence in cases decided by the Court of Claims to be included in the record certified to the Supreme Court when the latter grants a writ of certiorari.

A bill drafted in this Department to achieve this end is enclosed herewith. I recommend its enactment.

Sincerely yours,

HOMER CUMMINGS,
Attorney General.

With this letter was transmitted S. 198, which, when passed by both Houses of Congress and approved by the President on May 22, 1939, became Public, No. 81, of the Seventy-sixth Congress.

I quote it at length:

An act to provide that records certified by the Court of Claims to the Supreme Court, in response to writs of certiorari, may include material portions of the evidence, and for other purposes

Be it enacted, etc., That section 3, subsection b, of the act of February 13, 1925 (43 Stat. 936, 939, ch. 229; U. S. Code, title 28, sec. 288b), be amended, so as to read as follows:

"(b) In any case in the Court of Claims, including those begun under section 180 of the Judicial Code, it shall be competent for the Supreme Court, upon the petition of either party, whether Government or claimant, to require, by certiorari, that the cause be certified to it for review and determination of all errors assigned, with the same power and authority, and with like effect, as if the cause had been brought there by appeal. In such event, the Court of Claims shall include in the papers certified by it the findings of fact, the conclusions of law, and the judgment or decree, as well as such other parts of the record as are material to the errors assigned, to be settled by the Court.

"The Court of Claims shall promulgate rules to govern the preparation of such record in accordance with the provisions of this section.

"In such cases the Supreme Court shall have authority to review, in addition to other questions of law, errors assigned to the effect that there is a lack of substantial evidence to sustain a finding of fact; that an ultimate finding or findings are not sustained by the findings of evidentiary or primary facts; or that there is a failure to make any finding of fact on a material issue."

Approved, May 22, 1939.

But this act came too late to help Carden and Herd. Their case had been decided a year before. So their case came under the old law—section 288. There was nothing they could do but to ask Congress to give them by special act the right to appeal and have the Supreme Court decide what was right after considering the evidence upon which their claim was based. This they did, and the bill now under consideration will, if it becomes law, give them that right, and nothing more.

The Committee on the Judiciary is of the studied opinion that they are entitled to no less, and recommends that the bill do pass.

Our American law gives the right of appeal—a real review—even to a convicted murderer. Should we deny that right to American citizens who have never been suspected, much less charged, as criminals? [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Alabama has expired.

Mr. COSTELLO. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment which I send to the desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. COSTELLO: Page 2, line 9, after the word "are", strike out the word "paid" and insert "paid: Provided, That no part of any judgment which may be obtained in excess of 2 percent thereof shall be paid or delivered to or received by any agent or attorney on account of services rendered in connection with this claim, and the same shall be unlawful, any contract to the contrary notwithstanding. Any person violating the provisions of this act shall be deemed guilty of a misdemeanor and upon conviction thereof shall be fined in any sum not exceeding $1,000."

Mr. COSTELLO. Mr. Chairman, I have introduced this amendment which is the ordinary attorney's fee proviso, except that instead of being the usual 10 percent, I have made it 2 percent. The reason for doing that is that I understand there is a large number of lawyers interested in this claim besides Carden and Herd. I call to the attention of Members of this body the fact that these two men, concerning whom we have heard so much today about being patriotic citizens and trying to do so much for the Government at a time that we were about to go to war, owned these ships less than 30 days; that as a result of that they were paid every dollar of expense to which they were entitled. They received in all in excess of $8,000,000 from the Federal Government. Moreover, they received $550,000 as an award from Dent Board, that was purely profit, and there is no question about that. There was no expense against it. It was purely profit, and if these parties object to that amount of profit as not being sufficient, why did they not object at that time?

Mr. COX. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. COSTELLO. I cannot yield. The proponents of this bill have had control of the time during the hour of debate, and the opponents had only 14 minutes, and the same was true while the rule was under consideration. I call attention to the fact that these people received full reimbursement for every dollar they paid, and they are coming in here now asking for $7,000,000 worth of profit, for the ownership of ships to which they held title for less than 30 days. If anybody is entitled to any profit, why not give it to the real owners of those boats? They may have been Austrians, but you gave it to others. The Austrians were over a barrel, if I may use the expression. They were afraid that they were going to lose their ships. These two speculators came to them and offered them the minimum they thought they could get away with, and they induced the Austrians to sell those ships, and now they are coming back to the Government trying to get $7,000,000 worth of profit, plus 23 years' interest, which you have just now removed from the bill. I do not think they are entitled to it. Moreover, I call to your attention the statement of Mr. Bernard Baruch. The reason he went into this transaction was this. When these ships were offered to Mr. Denman, Chairman of the Shipping Board, Carden and Herd tried to sell them to the Government at cost plus 33⅓ percent of the net freight receipts which the Government would obtain. President Wilson rejected that offer because of the requirement that Carden and Herd should operate those ships.

On page 11 of the committee's latest report, No. 1616, we find the statement:

Mr. Baruch testified that he made no such agreement, and that his testimony on this phase of the case may be deemed interesting. * * * He testified, "The only difference of opinion is that I could not have said that 'I will promise you the operation of the ships,' and that is what I mean when I say I could not have entered into an obligation or contract for the leasing of those ships, but I have a very distinct recollection that I did say it was only fair, in the circumstances, that if these ships were leased they should have the first and prior opportunity for the operation of those ships on the same terms as anyone else, and I am quite certain that I said that to Mr. Denman."

But the fact is that the ships were not given to anyone to operate, other than the War Department, which used these ships as troop transports and for transportation of supplies during the war, two of them being sunk.

Carden and Herd are trying to allege a misunderstanding of the contract. Because of this the Congress sent this case to the Court of Claims for a determination to learn whether the memorandum of closing was in fact the full contract and also whether the award of the Dent board was a complete discharge of the claim. The Court of Claims has definitely found against Carden and Herd, from which judgment they moved for a new trial, which was also denied.

If you read the original report, No. 1313, you will find it contains a letter from the Attorney General, which states:

On the other hand, after a full trial on the merits, the Court of Claims has held that there was no legal obligation on the part of the Government to pay to the claimants any compensation in addition to the amount which they had already received, to wit, $8,391,028.70. By the award of the Secretary of War they realized a profit of $550,000 on this transaction. They now seek a further profit for which they did not stipulate in their original contract.

In view of the fact that Carden and Herd accepted the award of the Dent board, they should now be estopped from attempting to establish further claims. They never should have been allowed to go to the Court of Claims in the first instance. But the Congress did grant them this relief. Now having lost that action, and having lost their motion for a new trial, they come here seeking still further assistance. They had the audacity to ask in the original bill, H. R. 3356, that the court be authorized and directed to enter judgment in their behalf. Needless to say the Committee on the Judiciary rejected that proposal. It is needless to argue that the House should likewise reject this proposal since Carden and Herd have had their full day in court and are not entitled to any more. Especially they should not be permitted to pay out vast sums to attorneys who are promoting the legislation and who wish to prosecute the trial.

I hope this amendment is adopted.

Mr. FULMER. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word.

I am only going to take a couple of minutes. I am going to vote for the gentleman's amendment. I would like to ask the gentleman in charge of this bill if he is not willing to accept the amendment?

Mr. WEAVER. The usual proviso in a claims bill is 10 percent.

Mr. FULMER. I just asked a simple question. The gentleman can say "yes" or "no."

Mr. WEAVER. I do not think the committee could agree to accept 2 percent, but if the gentleman will follow the course of this committee in proposing the usual 10 percent amendment that is offered to all claims bills, I think it would be accepted.

Mr. COSTELLO. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FULMER. One minute. Just being a common layman I do not suppose I should take any part in this debate in that this seems to be a lawyers' bill. What are the facts in connection with this bill? It has been pending in and out of Congress for the past 20 years. It is very evident that the claimants have already received a profit in the original settlement. In the meantime there appears to be other claimants on the outside looking in. Then I gather from statements made here by various gentlemen that apparently there are numerous lawyers interested in this bill. There seem to be some in Texas, Kentucky, New York, and Washington. I am sure they will get at least 50 percent or more of it. Now, at this time in a long drawn out session of Congress when we are voting billions for national defense, after these gentlemen have gotten a settlement and a profit in years gone by, I am surprised that at such a serious time in the session of this Congress we should come in here with this type of bill and argue for favorable consideration on same.

What about millions of people who had losses in the last war and who had to sacrifice for the purpose of winning the World War? I wonder what the taxpayers of this country will think if we keep on in this session of Congress, instead of attending to that business which we should in connection with building up our national-defense program, from day to day bringing in just such type of bills as this. Why it would be better to have a recess. The sad story is when a great many of the Members come in who do not know anything about this bill will ask, "How does the committee stand," and vote accordingly. I hope that the Members of this House will vote down this bill. [Applause.]

Mr. COX. Mr. Chairman, I ask for recognition in opposition to the amendment.

Mr. Chairman, the statement made by the gentleman from California [Mr. COSTELLO] and the gentleman from South Carolina [Mr. FULMER], who just left the floor, demonstrates very clear that they are entirely unfamiliar with the record in this case. Gentlemen ought not to state as Members of this body and to you in your consideration of this question that Carden and Herd realized a profit out of the transaction concerning the taking over of these ships.

Mr. COSTELLO. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. COX. I yield.

Mr. COSTELLO. Was not the $550,000 awarded by the Dent board definitely a profit?

Mr. COX. Not a dime of it.

Mr. COSTELLO. What expense were they put to in obtaining that money?

Mr. COX. Not a dime of profit, and so stated by the Secretary of War. In negotiating the purchase of these ships these people were put to the necessity of raising a considerable amount of money, and they went to New York and formed a syndicate. In the formation of that syndicate they expended a sum in excess of $400,000. In the handling of the claim before the war board, and so forth, they paid out more than $275,000 in attorneys' fees. There was another considerable sum representing interest which they had paid on the original transaction and paid to the members of the syndicate on the money that they had invested in the undertaking.

Mr. McGRANERY. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. COX. Carden and Herd are out several hundred thousand dollars in excess of the $550,000 which the Secretary of War stated in substance represented the out-of-pocket money at that time.

Mr. McGRANERY. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. COX. No; I am sorry. Now, Mr. Chairman, if these had been alien ships taken by the Government the alien would have been paid the market value of the ships, and after the expiration of the war the ships would have been returned to the owners intact. The Committee on the Judiciary has stated in its report that Carden and Herd were treated worse than aliens were treated; and they were so treated.

They were not speculators—they were not engaged in the buying and selling of the ships. Their business was operating boats under contract, and when they bought these ships their main consideration was the operation of them. When they sold them to the New York syndicate they entered into a contract binding upon all concerned to the effect that they would have the right to operate them at the prevailing charge, at the usual charge made by others. When the Government came in and took the ships Carden and Herd never thought they were surrendering more than the profit they had in the sale, believing all the while—and the record is full of evidence to that effect—that they would be given an operating contract by the Government. Mr. Weeks said so and Mr. Denman said so. He testified that he wished he had the power to give them the contract, because nothing less than that represented substantial justice in the case.

Mr. ROBSION of Kentucky. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. COX. I yield.

Mr. ROBSION of Kentucky. This evidence, Mr. Chairman, shows that before the Government took over these ships from these people they had a bona fide offer to buy them for $14,000,000 in cash. The Government bought them for only $7,000,000.

Mr. SCHAFER of Wisconsin. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. SCHAFER of Wisconsin to the pending amendment: Strike out 2 percent and insert in lieu thereof 10 percent.

Mr. SUMNERS of Texas. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that all debate on the bill and all amendments thereto close in 5 minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Texas asks unanimous consent that all debate on this bill and all amendments thereto close in 5 minutes. Is there objection?

Mr. McGRANERY. Mr. Chairman, I object.

Mr. SUMNERS of Texas. Mr. Chairman, I move that all debate on the bill and all amendments thereto close in 5 minutes.

Mr. McGRANERY. Mr. Chairman, a point of order.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. McGRANERY. I make the point of order that the gentleman's motion is not in order. He has moved to close all debate on the entire bill, a unanimous-consent request. I submit, Mr. Chairman, that such a motion is not in order as to this section of the bill.

The CHAIRMAN. There is but one paragraph to the bill, the Chair will state to the gentleman from Pennsylvania. Extensive debate has been had on the bill and amendments. The gentleman from Texas is clearly within his rights to move to close debate. The point of order is overruled.

The gentleman from Wisconsin is recognized for 5 minutes.

Mr. SCHAFER of Wisconsin. Mr. Chairman, I shall not take the entire 5 minutes.

For the information of the House let me say that I am not an attorney. No attorney, no lobbyist, or no representative or other person has contacted me with reference to this bill. My efforts have been solely in the interest of perfecting this bill in order that it would only do what its sponsors and proponents claim they desire to do: Provide for an appeal to the United States Supreme Court on the questions of law and facts considered by the Court of Claims.

For many years all private claims bills have carried a uniform and customary 10-percent attorney-fee limitation proviso. I see no reason why we should deviate from the usual 10-percent limitation policy on this particular bill. If you adopt the 2-percent attorney's fee proviso carried in the Costello amendment then you are giving the very men whom he has denounced more money at the expense of the attorneys who might have rendered them some service. If a recovery is had, the court will determine what services these attorneys rendered and will set the amount of the attorneys' fees based on the services performed.

If you limit the fee to 2 percent, you will be playing Santa Claus to the claimants whom the author of the amendment has denounced. I sincerely hope that the House will follow its usual procedure and adopt the customary 10-percent attorney's fee limitation, so that if there are any attorneys who have performed any service they will be paid, should a recovery be had, and the Congress will not be playing Santa Claus to the claimants by allowing them to receive legal services without having to pay for them.

This bill, notwithstanding all that the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. FULMER] has stated, is not a $16,000,000 bill or a $16 bill. If I thought for a moment that it was I would not have tried to perfect it. This bill as now perfected merely gives these claimants the right to appeal to the Supreme Court of the United States and allow the Supreme Court to review the questions of law and facts which were considered by the Court of Claims. I can trust the United States Supreme Court as now constituted to make this review, the New Deal controlled Supreme Court, even though some of the New Deal gentlemen on my left apparently cannot do so.

Mr. EBERHARTER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SCHAFER of Wisconsin. I yield.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair recognizes the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. McGRANERY].

Mr. EBERHARTER. Mr. Chairman, the gentleman from Wisconsin yielded to me. His time has not expired. Debate has been limited on the bill.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Wisconsin sat down and thus relinquished the floor.

Mr. SCHAFER of Wisconsin. Mr. Chairman, I had not resumed my seat. I was halfway down, but I had not resumed my seat.

The CHAIRMAN. When the gentleman from Wisconsin took his seat he relinquished the floor. The Chair had promised to recognize the gentleman from Pennsylvania.

The gentleman from Pennsylvania is recognized for 2 minutes.

Mr. McGRANERY. Mr. Chairman, a great deal has been said with respect to the fee to be paid if this bill is passed and the Supreme Court should award judgment. The amount of the claim involved is something over $7,000,000. Thus, if the 10-percent proviso is adopted it will mean a fee of $700,000 to these lawyers.

The managers of the bill have used a rather unusual procedure. They filed two reports. They bring in now Report No. 1616, but they forgot there was a Report No. 1313, in which the Attorney General had this to say with respect to whether or not anyone got profit:

On the other hand, after a full trial on the merits, the Court of Claims has held there was no legal obligation on the part of the Government to pay the complainants any compensation in addition to the amount which they had previously received, to wit, $8,391,028.70.

And he then goes on to say that they realized a profit of $550,000.

You vote for this bill and you are going to face the consequences in November. In conscience, there is nothing here that might justify it. Has anyone told you anything about these other people or why they got out or how they got out? This, to my mind, is one of the most peculiar, to put it mildly, bills that I have ever seen in this Congress, and I hope it is voted down.

The question was taken; and on a division (demanded by Mr. McDOWELL) there were—ayes 76, noes 64.

So the amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from California [Mr. COSTELLO] as amended.

The amendment as amended was agreed to.

The CHAIRMAN. Under the rule, the Committee rises.

Accordingly the Committee rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. LUTHER A. JOHNSON, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, reported that that committee, having had under consideration the bill (H. R. 7230) to provide for an appeal to the Supreme Court of the United States from the decision of the Court of Claims in a suit instituted by George A. Carden and Anderson T. Herd, pursuant to House Resolution 407, he reported the same back to the House with sundry amendments agreed to in the Committee of the Whole.

The SPEAKER. Under the rule the previous question is ordered on the bill and amendments to final passage.

Is a separate vote demanded on any amendment? If not, the Chair will put them en gros.

The amendments were agreed to.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, and was read the third time.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the passage of the bill.

The question was taken; and on a division (demanded by Mr. WEAVER) there were—ayes 60, noes 115.

So the bill was rejected, and a motion to reconsider was laid on the table.

THE AMERICAN FORMULA MUST BE PRESERVED—A FAIR CHANCE FOR A FREE PEOPLE

Mr. MUNDT. Mr. Speaker, since January 1939 Congress has been in session almost 18 of the 20 months which have elapsed between then and now. Members of this Congress have not only set something of a peacetime record in the manner in which they have stayed in session almost continuously, but when the book of history is finally written I believe it will show that this Congress has also done much to improve and protect the American way of life. It is my purpose today to review some of these accomplishments and to suggest steps which must still be taken if prosperous and happy living are to be fully restored in this country and the proceeds of labor and trade equitably made available to all our citizens.

I would like to mention at this point that when I started campaigning for Congress in September of 1938 I determined to place before the people of my district a definite set of principles which would govern my action if elected. I summarized these principles by a slogan which, to me, represents the American formula describing the ultimate goal of Government in this Republic. This slogan was, "A fair chance for a free people." To my way of thinking, this slogan describes the goal toward which good self-government should steadily strive. I submit that fairness of opportunity for all and freedom of choice and selection represent the American way of life. This formula must be preserved. "A fair chance for a free people" must be expanded to all our citizens and protected for future generations. I want to examine with you for awhile today the record of our 18 months of steady sessions to see what we have done and what we have yet to do to develop both fairness and freedom for people in every walk of life in America.

I do this not only because it provides me an opportunity to survey my own record in Congress in view of the fair-chance program upon which I ran but because I believe so wholeheartedly in the validity of this program that I am trying to enlist as much of the country as I can in a crusade to defend and apply this American formula. This conviction that good representative government should provide "a fair chance for a free people" has been my guidepost both before entering Congress and since I have been a member of this body. As long as I am in public life or as long as I can exert any influence in private life, I shall continue to urge progress toward this objective. To me, it is the essence of the American way of life.

We are hearing much these days of clean-politics reforms and Senator HATCH, Wendell Willkie, and Attorney General Jackson are making real progress in this direction through their straightforward stands despite last week's statement of Chairman Flynn, of the Democratic National Committee, that neither the spirit, the word, nor the purpose of the Hatch Act will stop him from continuing the practice of sandbagging big corporations for so-called advertising donations to the Democratic campaign manual.

We now require candidates for Federal office to file an advance statement of campaign expenses. That is fine. I favor that. But from the standpoint of good government it is equally important that we should require candidates for reelection to file sworn statements of service in advance of their campaigns, giving detailed reports of their activities and votes in support of Government policies advocated in their party platforms and campaign speeches. This would compel a wholesome self-examination by all officials and would provide a helpful printed analysis of a candidate's record for the voting public. If my suggestion were in effect, party platforms and personal-campaign statements would cease to be "scraps of paper," and the people could exercise a better check on their public servants. I am sure, for example, that fewer of the commendable policies advocated in platforms of 1932 and 1936 would now be in the ashcan.

During my campaign I distributed in my State over 60,000 copies of this fair-chance program, detailing the steps by which I believed both fairness and freedom in economic, social, and governmental activity could be advanced. A framed copy of this statement is in my office to constantly remind me of this challenge which I made and accepted for myself. To many of you in Congress I have handed or mailed copies of this program for a better, fairer, freer America, and today I again want to stress this fundamental formula for meeting and solving the problems which confront us. I know that the Members of the House join me in recognizing that if self-government is to be safeguarded in this Republic we must work steadily to make America fair and to keep America free. To do this we must keep the people informed. In a republic with representative government the voters cannot know too much about their government and the people in it.

FIRST, A FAIR CHANCE FOR AGRICULTURE

Coming from a great agricultural district as I do, it is natural that my first consideration in Congress and in working toward a fair chance for all is for the American farmer. Two years ago, when I was campaigning for Congress, and today, the greatest need of this country as a prerequisite for sound recovery is for a permanent farm program which will place the farmer on a parity with labor, industry, and business in receiving a fair reward for his labors and in enjoying an equitable relationship between the prices which he receives and those he pays. During these 18 months of meetings, committee proceedings, congressional debates, and adopted legislation we have made progress toward that goal; but we have fallen far short of reaching it. The farm problem has been relieved, but it has not been permanently solved. Compared to many types of labor with guaranteed minimum wages and maximum hours and with many business activities enjoying legislation assuring them a fair margin of profit, the farmer is still the forgotten man.

Since being in Congress, I have voted and worked for every piece of farm legislation which seemed to offer even a remote hope of helping the farmer. I have voted for every appropriation bill designed to provide parity payments, benefit checks, or other assistance to the farmers and have appeared before committees in support or spoken on the floor in defense of many of them. These payments have helped the farmer survive but they have not solved the problem of giving him an honest price for the full output of his farm, and they have not enabled him to regain the opportunities he once had of making profits enough on his farm during the active period of his life so that he could move to town and retire in old age in the manner of farmers of other generations in America. He has lost much of fairness and a lot of freedom, but he has not gained the parity of opportunity which must be his before America as a whole can build a prosperity on a solid foundation.

During my campaign, I voiced criticism of the unfair chance the farmer is receiving in a 10-point statement, with suggestions for correcting these injustices, as follows:

(1) Feed America with American farm products; (2) a just price for a full crop—the farmer must ultimately use his full plant at a fair profit if he is to have the parity of opportunity he deserves; (3) increase commodity loans to 75 percent of parity, making them callable only at parity; (4) reduce marketing and transportation costs; (5) develop crop insurance on a businesslike basis; (6) give honest help to the honest farmer—meaning such emergency aids as seed and feed loans should be scaled down or canceled when the emergency giving rise to the need continued so that the loans could not be repaid; (7) a farm for every farmer and a farmer for every farm; (8) no compulsion and no penalties—the freedom of the farmer must be protected while fairness is being provided him; (9) conserve water as a public asset; (10 enlarge the market for farm products by adding factory markets for farm products.

I am glad to record here and now, Mr. Speaker, that in the 18 months which this Congress has been in session we have made definite progress on many of these points; we have not completely attained any of them; on some we have a long way yet to go; but we have been making progress.

Eighteen Members of the House, of which I was one, joined in introducing the so-called cost-of-production bill for agriculture which was later changed to provide full parity for the farmer instead of cost of production which the Agriculture Department said was harder to calculate equitably. We who sponsored this bill accepted this change because both cost of production and parity will figure out about the same if an accurate index number is used. We have not succeeded in getting our bill out of committee although hearings were held and we came within a very few votes of getting a favorable report. A petition is now on the Speaker's desk with over 100 signatures, asking for an opportunity to have the bill considered by the House. War conditions overseas and our emergency-defense program at home have temporarily detoured attention away from domestic issues, but legislation giving the farmer full parity prices for the supplies he sells domestically is far from dead. We shall stress for renewed consideration of it the first opportunity given by the administrative leadership. Many Democrats and Republicans have joined in this fight for fair play for the farmer through legislation which will assure him a decent American price for his products. Such a program will, in itself, achieve many of the goals in the 10-point statement I have previously mentioned.

Mr. O'CONNOR. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MUNDT. I am happy to yield to the gentleman from Montana.

Mr. O'CONNOR. I have had the privilege of serving on two committees of the House with the distinguished gentleman from South Dakota, now addressing us; namely, the Committee on Indian Affairs and the Committee on Irrigation and Reclamation. The gentleman is especially well informed on matters relating to Indian problems, and in the short period of time he has been a member of that committee, he has endeared himself to his colleagues for his painstaking and thorough consideration of all problems affecting the Indians. He has proven to be their friend.

The gentleman from South Dakota, now addressing us, has likewise proven himself to be a friend of the farmer and stockman. On the floor of this House he has repeatedly advocated and supported measures for the benefit of the farmers and those engaged in the livestock industry. He commands the admiration and respect of the Members of the House whenever he chooses to address. Mr. Chairman, I regard the gentleman from South Dakota as one of our most valued Members of the House. He may always be counted upon to fight the battle of the common man.

[Applause.]

Mr. MUNDT. I thank the gentleman from Montana for his kind remarks. He is a distinguished Democrat and a valuable statesman. I appreciate his comments, because he and I have had the opportunity of working together frequently on legislation of interest to the West and to agriculture. The people of Montana are serving the country well in sending such a distinguished Democrat to Congress.

Mr. AUGUST H. ANDRESEN. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MUNDT. I am happy to yield to the gentleman from Minnesota.

Mr. AUGUST H. ANDRESEN. I was pleased to hear the gentleman from Montana, whom I consider one of the leading Democrats in the House, give that fine testimonial to the gentleman from South Dakota. I am sure the mutual admiration the two gentlemen have for each other is sincere, and that in his remarks the gentleman from Montana spoke the opinion of all the Members of Congress, whether they be Republicans or Democrats. [Applause.]

Mr. MUNDT. I thank the gentleman very kindly.

Mr. AUGUST H. ANDRESEN. I would like to add that as a long-standing member of the House Agriculture Committee, I have watched the gentleman from South Dakota's interest and activity in behalf of the American farmer. He is rendering a distinct service to agriculture and is always found fighting in the farmer's corner. As chairman of a special voluntary bipartisan committee last summer, I appointed the gentleman from South Dakota [Mr. MUNDT] chairman of a committee of three Democrats and three Republicans to make recommendations and devise methods for increasing the price of lard, which was then selling at almost an all-time low. His committee investigated the problem thoroughly and made several unanimous recommendations for getting the farmer a better price for his lard.

One of these recommendations was to have lard placed on the list of surplus commodities to be distributed by the Government. This recommendation was vigorously supported by this committee, and on September 30, 1939, the Surplus Commodities Corporation placed lard on its distribution list. Lard prices almost immediately started going up, and American hog producers owe a real debt of gratitude to the work of Mr. MUNDT's committee a year ago last July.

Mr. MUNDT. Let me briefly review some of the action and progress taking place in this Congress on other specific items of this 10-point program. These are all found in the written history of this session and reported in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, but it will do us all good to refresh our memories concerning the victories we have won or the fights we have lost for greater justice for the farmer.

"Feed America with American farm products." The vast farm imports occurring under the Hull reciprocal trade treaties did much to keep American farm prices down prior to the outbreak of the European war last September and in certain cases are still a great depressing factor in the American market. These great competitive importations of foodstuffs and farm products which have come in to displace products from American farms have been criticized and condemned by Democrats, Progressives, and Republicans alike who sit in Congress as Representatives of farming areas. These battles we have neither completely won nor lost.

While the treaty power was extended over the almost unanimous protest and negative votes of Representatives from the entire agricultural Middle West, we did succeed in stopping negotiations with Argentina which would have added tremendously to the flood of competitive farm imports. We also succeeded in demonstrating that the United States Navy need not buy its beef from Argentina because it is "neither better nor infinitely cheaper." I had the personal pleasure of bringing into the Well of this House a can of corned beef imported from Argentina which I purchased in the Department of Agriculture store located almost immediately below Secretary Wallace's own office in that building and pointing out the injustice and inconsistency of a Department policy based on the theory of a surplus at home which offered for sale in its own store, imported beef from abroad. I still have this can of beef in my office. I think I shall save it as a souvenir as many of you have told me that the Department of Agriculture has reformed at least to that extent. Apparently, Argentine beef is no longer being sold under the direct auspices of Secretary Wallace. So far, so good, but we still have a long way to go before giving the American farmer the protection he is entitled to in order to enjoy the full advantage of the American price level in the American market for the products which he raises on an American farm.

We have succeeded in upping the percentage of parity payments and progress has been made in extending and expanding commodity loans. Marketing costs and transportation charges are still too high although legislative action promising to correct at least part of the transportation situation has passed the House. Crop insurance, where available, is becoming more helpful; it is still too expensive and too exclusive in its operation. Honest help to the honest farmer is becoming more of a practice and less of a promise, but many feed and seed loans are yet to be reduced or canceled and the bill to refund to the hog raiser the costs of unconstitutional tax payments has yet to be passed. When the bill was left to gather dust in the committee, I introduced a petition to bring it out; following this, the committee took action and by the narrow margin of one vote failed to bring in a favorable report. Justice demands that these repayments be paid to the hog producers and the fight for this elemental justice will not be dropped. I urge those of you who have not yet signed my petition to do so without delay.

Several bills making it easier to secure "a farm for every farmer and a farmer for every farm" have passed this session of Congress. I have supported them. However, the goal is far ahead of our stage of endeavor and the principal obstacle remains the lack of parity prices for farm products. No matter how easy the payments, it is hard for a farmer to pay for a farm unless he can sell for a profit the products of that farm. It is my conviction that the parity price bill previously described and introduced by 18 of us, will correct this situation. It will also eliminate compulsion and penalties as a part of any agricultural program.

Water is being increasingly recognized by this body as a great public asset as my work as a member of the important Irrigation and Reclamation Committee has brought home to me many times. In this connection, I am grateful to this House for having twice passed my legislation to prevent the indiscriminate spread of pollution in America—the fact that this legislation was introduced by a new Member on the minority side and received your favorable vote bespeaks eloquently of the recognition which this House has of the axiom that water is a public asset.

I was also successful in passing a resolution calling for a complete survey and study of that stretch of the Missouri River and its tributaries which flows through South Dakota in order to disclose its possibilities for power development, for irrigation, and for navigation. The United States Army Engineers are now making that survey and have been at work over 8 months in actual testings on the river. It is a huge task to conduct such a survey but it is being done carefully. When the results become available, I hope they will indicate means by which this great stretch of the Missouri River can be added to the utilized water assets of America for the purpose of increasing the economic strength and stamina of the country.

Enlargement of the market for farm products by adding factory markets for supplies from the farm is slowly but surely becoming a long-range Government policy. It has been my privilege to vote for appropriations setting up Government scientific plants to speed up this program, and as a member of a special committee of Congressmen to study farm chemurgy and its possibilities for helping provide "a parity of opportunity," I have come to have even a greater appreciation and respect for the new uses which can be made of farm products. I urge you all to give full consideration to this great potential market which can be developed for consuming the full crop and the entire products of completely utilized American farm properties. Once the full possibilities of farm chemurgy are developed we can again begin paying the farmer a premium for "making two blades of grass grow where one grew before," instead of encouraging him to reduce the products from his broad acres.

THE FAIR-CHANCE PROGRAM APPLIES TO EVERYBODY

I recognize that not all of you are interested, directly, in the problems of the American farmer. Nor are all the people of South Dakota farmers, although our whole economic fabric out there is directly interwoven with the success or failure of our farmers to show a profit from their labors. The American formula of "A fair chance for a free people" can and must be applied to all occupations and to all groups if we are to conquer the black demon of depression in this country and give continuing significance to the immortal phrase in our Declaration of Independence that "all men are created equal."

In my own fair-chance program and in the pattern of activity of this Congress, Mr. Speaker, I believe that America can provide a fair chance for all and preserve each individual's freedom if we utilize Government in its rightful capacity as arbitrator and umpire and avoid the fatal temptation to turn over to Government and to politicians too much authority, and too much power so that it begins operating private industries after the manner of the totalitarian tyrants of Europe. Such a centralization of power in the hands of one man or in the hands of bureaucrats provides for the common citizen the blessings of neither freedom nor fairness.

Let me briefly indicate how a fair chance for a free people can be offered various groups in our society and suggest what we have and have not done toward attaining this goal.

A FAIR CHANCE FOR LABOR

Labor: The man who labors must have a fair chance in life. None with honest hearts and decent minds will deny this objective. That means for American workmen the right to be protected against the products from sweatshops at home and abroad. It means his right to enjoy the American standard of living which he cannot do if he is forced into direct competition with products made by dictatorial governments using semislave labor, or in other lands where wages are too low to hold body and soul together. Against such unfair competition, the American laborer has a right to be protected by an American tariff. And against unfair practices at home, he has a right to organize and to bargain collectively. These rights I have always upheld. I shall continue to protect them.

Neither private employer, political bureau, nor foreign competitor must be given the power to take from the American workingman his right to bargain collectively through unions of his own choosing for wages and living conditions compatible with the American standard of living. In these 18 months I have frequently voted for legislation to better the opportunity and to increase the protection for American workers. We must all continue to devote ourselves to improving conditions for the man who works. His efforts have built the great structures and industries of America; these great assets must in turn pay out to him the fair chance which he deserves.

Mr. LANDIS. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MUNDT. Yes; I yield to the gentleman from Indiana.

Mr. LANDIS. I have been listening to the speech of the gentleman from South Dakota with considerable interest. He has made a very effective plea for a better day for American labor. As a member of the House Committee on Labor, I have watched his record in this session in behalf of the workingman and I am happy to state that I am grateful for the gentleman's contribution to labor. I feel that labor, both in the organized and unorganized branches, has a real friend in the gentleman from South Dakota.

Mr. MUNDT. I thank the gentleman very much. He comes from a great labor district and his own record of high service to labor is such that I am especially grateful for his observations concerning my own position.

A FAIR CHANCE FOR OUR VETERANS

The veterans of the World War and of earlier wars must not be neglected in these sorry times when our attention is so frequently directed to problems growing out of another war. Many veterans of past wars have never attained the fair chance which they sacrificed as soldiers to protect America. I am one of those who believe that America can never overpay the debt it owes to those who sacrificed health and home and life to bring victory to America after our involvement in the World War. I was happy to vote for the pension legislation in this Congress both to repay travel allowance to the Spanish War veterans entitled to it and to liberalize pension provisions for World War veterans. While one of these bills had to be passed over President Roosevelt's veto, I am glad that this House and the Senate took this patriotic stand because sound patriotism cannot be built upon a premise which denies justice to the men whose sacrifice is called upon to defend that Nation.

By the same token, I hope the Members of this House will approve my bill to build a Royal C. Johnson Memorial Veterans' Facility in South Dakota as soon as the Veterans' Administration building program is resumed. That great friend of yours and mine who so unhappily passed away last year gave much of his life to securing some degree of justice for the veterans of America, and most unselfishly never sought a hospital or other facility for his own district. This district now needs such facilities most seriously and when money is again available, I am sure his many friends here will join me in a program to erect such an establishment to his memory.

AND FOR THE AGED

For the aged, who may or may not have had a real fair chance in active life, the country should strive to provide freedom from worry and want in old age. The present Social Security Act offers little solace to the great bulk of our needy aged. It must be replaced by a pension program of national scope which will not penalize poor people who happen to live in a poor State, and which will not put a stigma on the elderly citizen for accepting a check from his Government. I have voted consistently for every bill and every amendment to existing legislation which was aimed at correcting the injustices and inequalities of existing law labeled as social-security legislation. This Congress has failed to make much progress in this matter, but the problem cannot be forgotten nor pigeonholed. The fight for justice to the aged must be carried on.

FOR BUSINESS—FOR YOUTH

For business, too, and for youth, the great American principle of a fair chance for all must be revived and reaffirmed. Here in Congress, I have voted for legislation tending to protect independent businessmen from monopolistic oppression and to free honest business from shackles which prevent its expansion and development under private initiative. I have sought, too, to retard and dissolve the great bureaucratic devices which harrass and impede business, needlessly, and against which businessmen have had so little protection during the past 6 or 7 years.

I was one of the early supporters of the Walter-Logan bill which passed the House but which languishes in the Senate as I now speak. That bill will give decent business the right it needs to protest unfair regulations and to protect itself against autocratic exercise of government power by boards, bureaus, and commissions, and will do much to renew confidence and stimulate recovery if it passes. It denies the thesis that "every businessman is a crook" and gives him a right to utilize the courts in securing justice against arrogant officials whose crack-down activities have caused so many businesses to crack up, and add to the unemployment and distress of our communities.

Youth, my colleagues, has a vital stake in business as it has in all economic, social, and governmental activity. The slogan, "What helps business helps you" applies particularly to youth. Where there is no business, there is no job. Where there is no job, there is no opportunity for youth. Millions of our young people between the ages of 18 and 25 have never held a private job. Many of the young men to whom the country now looks for the keystone of its defense establishment have never had an opportunity to enjoy the fair chance and freedom from want which America should provide to all its citizens. Through my votes for the N. Y. A. and by my efforts in joining the bloc in Congress which successfully worked for increased appropriations for the N. Y. A. and for the C. C. C., I have tried to help compensate to youth for the failure of the New Deal to stimulate recovery and reopen the doors of opportunity to youth. But all this is a sorry substitute for profitable jobs in private business or industry, and this country has far to go before it will have applied the goal of a fair chance for a free people to the youth of America. To be of real assistance to youth, we must first of all end this depression.

YES—A FAIR CHANCE FOR THE TAXPAYER, TOO

Let us next consider the taxpayer whose sacrifices have only begun to be required in order to meet the colossal national debt which now towers at approximately $50,000,000,000.

Perhaps it would be easier to discuss what we have done "to the taxpayer" than to discuss what we have done "for him." As indirect and hidden taxes have steadily been enlarged and increased under the New Deal, everybody has become more and more a heavy taxpayer in America. Too great a portion of these taxes are presently paid by the poor man with a large family through the seductive device of hidden taxes amounting to percentages which are indeed startling when we consider that still the Federal Budget is far from balanced, still we sink further and further into debt every year, still the burdens of taxation must be piled higher and higher.

For example, out of every dollar now spent for furniture, 13 cents goes for tax; out of every dollar spent for automobiles, 15 cents is tax; out of every dollar spent for rent, 25 cents is tax; out of every dollar spent for sugar, 18 cents is tax; for matches, 13 cents; for beer, 34 cents; for shaving cream, 20 cents; out of every dollar spent for men's clothing, 12 cents goes to the tax collector, and so it goes. One reason so many people are not getting ahead economically in America, and one reason the family budget will not stretch from Monday morning until Saturday night is that the drain of indirect taxes to pay for wasteful governmental expenditures is too great. To reduce it will require more business management in government, less waste and corruption, fewer people on the Government pay roll, an end of a depression which threatens to become chronic since we have had it for almost 10 years.

While the unemployment and income figures of the depression have remained about constant at the low levels of 1932 and 1933, the costs of the depression to the general public—all of whom pay taxes—have risen alarmingly. Taxation is sucking the eggs, today, faster than we can find the nests in which they are laid.

In an effort to help decrease the unnecessary costs of Government and to better distribute the burdens of taxation, I was one of the early advocates of the Hatch Act to prevent pernicious political activity by public officials, and I supported and voted for the legislation doing away with tax-exempt salaries in America. Thus, while I became the first Congressman from my district ever to pay a full income tax on his own salary, I voted for this legislation with the realization that my salary and that of other public officials had no more right to be tax-exempt than have public officials a right to be exempt from other laws. I think tax-exempt securities should also be eliminated; there should be no cyclone cellars in America where public men or private capitalists can hide their income and keep it from paying its full share of the common costs of Government.

I was also one of the three Members of Congress who spoke out in debate for an excess-profits tax on the manufacture of war supplies when the tax bill of 1940 came to us without any such provision, and with tax schedules which would collect from consumers 75 percent of all the money it raises. The bill passed without the excess-profits-tax clause in it, but the public reaction has been such that the correction I advocated at that time is now being considered in committee, and a special bill will soon come before us to prevent the development of another generation of war millionaires.

RELIEF

In the matter of relief, this Congress has made great strides in the direction of seeing to it that a greater share of the relief dollar gets to the needy. The passage of the Hatch Act, already mentioned, was a big step in this direction. The elimination of many "white collar" positions has helped. I supported the motion to investigate the whole relief set-up and have supported the reforms proposed by this committee. I have voted for every relief appropriation passing Congress during the past 18 months of legislative session, and have worked with others from rural areas to give our people a fairer consideration from relief authorities in comparison with relief clients in large cities who formerly received as much as $250 per month. We have made progress. And relief must continue. But we must all give greater consideration to the development of a prosperous condition in this country where men on relief can secure honest jobs in private industry at decent scales of pay again. Relief rolls must never become the permanent pattern of reducing unemployment in America if a fair chance for a free people is to be extended to everybody as it must be if the ideals of our constitutional forefathers are to be achieved.

In recognition of the fact that the best final answer to the relief problem is to reopen the doors of opportunity to the unemployed so that regular jobs at regular wages may again be made available to all who want to work, 70 Members of this House, last winter, voluntarily got together and formed a nonpartisan unemployment conference. The purpose of this conference was to work out proposals for remedying the deplorable economic situation giving rise to the need for relief. At the second meeting Congressman JERRY VOORHIS, of California, was elected as chairman, and I was honored by being elected as vice chairman. Thus with a Democratic chairman and a Republican vice chairman we proceeded along strictly nonpartisan lines to examine the whole unemployment situation, its causes and its cures, to the end that relief might be replaced by recovery, and that labor throughout the land could find steadier and more profitable employment.

The members of this conference met in weekly sessions for many months and we of the executive committee held meetings in between times. Careful, written reports were made by 14 subcommittees, and a list of 12 causes of unemployment and 16 approaches to its cure was officially approved by all but five members of our conference. These reports and recommendations have been published as a House document known as Document 850, and are available to each of you. It is the expectation of our conference to press for action on this problem just as soon as the emergency matters dealing with national defense are completed.

RESTORATION OF SOUND GOVERNMENT NEEDED IN AMERICA

Mr. Speaker, I want to discuss one other aspect of this program to rebuild America and to rededicate it to the ideals of our forefathers and then I am through. We must give more attention, all of us, to the restoration of sound Government in America. We must join hands to defeat the subversive invasion of foreign ideals into our American concept of Government. Such foreign "isms" as nazi-ism, fascism, communism, and other doctrines stemming from the premise that in each country there is or must be "an indispensable man" must be stopped in their tracks. We have been too lenient with these "peddlers of piffle," who, through such organizations as the Nazi bunds, the Communist Party, and the Fascist front groups, seek to enjoy all of the protection and advantages of our American Constitution while preaching and practicing doctrines to overthrow our form of government and set up a one-man control over here. They not only jeopardize our national defense against possible invaders from without; they actually threaten to destroy the basic aspects of our own liberties and freedoms from within.

Once we accept the doctrine of "individual indispensability" in America, and deny ourselves the right or the custom of changing our leaders at regularly prescribed periods, we nullify the very basis of the philosophy that "under God the people rule" which has so long been so generally accepted in America. Once we accept the theory that our national destiny is tied to the personality of any one man, it becomes only necessary for the bundsters, the Communists, or the Fascists to get their man in control and all that we have cherished for more than 150 years comes falling down upon our heads in a deluge of lost liberties.

I started fighting Hitlerism, Stalinism, and the malicious methods of Mussolini out in my State in 1933. I have never stopped that fight. They are all manifestations of the same godless doctrine that the State is everything, the citizen nothing. They all practice the formula of "the part is mightier than the whole" instead of the formula of "a fair chance for a free people." They must not prevail in America either by direct invasion, by internal expansion, or by the insidious practice of putting their theories of one-man control and complete centralization of power into effect in this country under some other name.

To help rid America of these alien "isms" which have been imported here from foreign lands, I have been active in supporting the work of the Dies committee. I voted for its appropriations and to give it an enlarged sphere of action. I have defended it against its critics and have supported its corrective recommendations. Constitutional democracy is the best safeguard—perhaps the only one—against nazi-ism, communism, and fascism. The closer we can keep the democratic processes of self-government to the people, the better we can preserve the basic framework of the only Government in the world capable of providing the fair chance for a free people which, to me, is the supreme objective and responsibility of all popular government.

OUR NATIONAL DEFENSE

During the past few months alone I have voted for more than 30 different measures to perfect America's national defense establishments and before the Habana Conference was called I advocated in a speech on the floor of this House that this country take steps to develop a "Pan American Pro-Americanism" which would contribute to the mutual strength, prosperity, and stability of both North and South America. I have thus worked and voted for national defense with consistent determination because I realize this country must perfect its defenses and preserve its peace if we are to fulfill our manifest destiny in the world's family of nations.

If America is to remain safe America must be strong because it is only by being both safe and strong that this Republic can attain its objective of providing "a fair chance to the free people" of this last great laboratory of self-government in all the world.

Mr. Speaker, as the foreword to the fair-chance program upon which I campaigned in coming to Congress, and which has governed my actions and decisions here, I made a two-paragraph statement which I now ask leave to include with these remarks at this point.

A PERSONAL MESSAGE FROM YOUR CANDIDATE FOR CONGRESS

The time has come in America to stop calling names and to quit trying to climb up by tearing others down. It is time for Government to provide a fair chance for the free people of this country. America is big enough to give agriculture, labor, business, and the professions each a fair chance; by working together for a new day the American way this country can continue to lead the world. It is only by fighting among ourselves that we can fail. As a liberal Republican, I yield to no man in my desire to give the common people of this country a fair chance in life and insist this fair chance can come best under our American system of representative democracy. Freedom and liberty are too precious to trade for any promise of reward—a free people can always obtain a fair chance for themselves if they retain control of their government. It is only when rights to govern themselves are taken away that the common people become permanently distressed.

The farm program described on the reverse side and which I am advocating for the American farmer is based on many years of experience in the farming business. Both from my own farm in Lake County and as a result of countless conferences with farmers and farm leaders, I have learned from personal contact the value of the 10 points in my fair-chance program for agriculture. I am convinced this program will help make your farm and my farm pay—if it is a good plan for our farms it is a good plan for farming as a whole. If elected to Congress, I shall fight for the adoption of this program. I urge all citizens regardless of political faith to join me in this crusade to end bickering and quarreling between classes and groups and to join forces in modernizing Government to provide a fair chance for a free people.

KARL E. MUNDT.

Mr. Speaker, I believed in the validity of the foregoing statement 2 years ago. I believe in it today. I commend it to the careful consideration of us all as we face the troubled times ahead and seek to utilize the devices of free government to preserve the peace and protect the freedom of America. Some citizens may not be interested in every portion of this program but every citizen should be interested in some aspects of it because the attainment of the goal of fairness of opportunity and freedom of choice for everybody is a fundamental goal of this Government. We must continue to fight toward the realization of this goal. I urge all who hear this talk or who read it in the RECORD to join me in setting into action in every section of this country a great crusading drive to rededicate America to its true destiny, and to provide for one and all the fullness of opportunity and the preservation of ancient liberties which have always been the backbone of the American spirit and the American way of life. We must not stop this crusade until victory is completely and finally won. Let us all devote ourselves to this task. [Applause.]

WASHINGTON, D. C., August 6, 1940.

The Honorable DAVID I. WALSH,
United States Senate, Washington, D. C.

DEAR SENATOR WALSH: At the request of the Committee to Defend America by Aiding the Allies, which has its Massachusetts headquarters at 45 Devonshire Street, Boston, I hand you herewith a petition signed by nearly 20,000 citizens of New England urging, among other things, adoption of the principle of universal military training which is embodied in the Burke-Wadsworth bill now pending in Congress.

Mr. Mayo A. Shattuck, executive vice chairman of the committee, wrote you about this petition under date of August 1, urging that you support the bill in question and oppose any amendment which does not involve the principle of service by all citizens of the Nation.

Very respectfully,

ROGER S. GREENE.

To the table:

[Committee to Defend America, unify our spirit, speed our defenses, aid the Allies. William Allen White, national chairman; James Bryant Conant, honorary New England chairman; Alvan T. Fuller, New England chairman]

To Senator DAVID I. WALSH,
Washington, D. C.:

This committee was formed to stimulate public opinion to the proposition that the first line of defense of American liberty lay in aiding the Allies. We are still dedicated to that proposition. Great progress has been made. Much remains to be done. It is now clear that our first line of defense must be supplemented and strengthened by an irresistible drive for complete and impregnable national defense, both moral and material. We therefore pledge our efforts to the attainment of these great objectives:

I. NATIONAL UNITY

Our national spirit must be united in the belief that the American way of life is best suited to the attainment of happiness for mankind. Our determination that this way of life shall not perish must be engraved in the hearts of all Americans.

II. NATIONAL REARMAMENT

The material supplies for military defense must be created by universal national service and effort. The manpower for such defense must be created by universal military training. All men, all women, all property must share the burden.

III. AID TO THE ALLIES

So long as the Allies or any one of them are fighting, and so long as the British Fleet rides the waves in the protection of liberty, we must assure a continued and increasing supply of materials and aid.

We, the undersigned, most urgently request the President, our Senators, and our Representatives to take immediate action to accomplish the ends above set forth by legislation or by Executive order.

SELECTIVE COMPULSORY MILITARY SERVICE—LETTER FROM SISTERS OF ST. JOSEPH, WHEELING, W. VA.

Mr. HOLT presented a letter from the Sisters of St. Joseph, Wheeling, W. Va., addressed to the chairman of the Senate Committee on Military Affairs, which was ordered to lie on the table and to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

ST. JOSEPH'S CONVENT,
Wheeling, W. Va.

The Honorable MORRIS SHEPPARD,
Chairman, Senate Military Affairs Committee,
Washington, D. C.

DEAR SIR: We, a congregation of religious women numbering 200 citizens and voters, hereby make statement concerning our attitude toward the Burke-Wadsworth bill:

1. We are convinced that the draft should not be compulsory; that if such movement go into effect, the draft of our men should be by voluntary enlistment.

2. That due consideration be given as to whether or not present conditions justify a measure so far reaching in its effects.

3. We request specifically that in the interests of the national welfare the measure itself provide for the exemption from draft of regularly and duly ordained ministers of religion, for students for the priesthood, and brothers under vow to serve the works of religion.

We trust that, with regard to our dear United States at least, the announcement of the angels at the birth of Christ—"Peace on earth to men of good will"—be carried out in its fullness, and that the blessing of the Prince of Peace descend upon the world.

Sincerely yours,

SISTERS OF ST. JOSEPH,
Wheeling, W. Va.
Mother M. MAGDALEN, Superior.

EXTENSION OF OLD-AGE AND SURVIVORS' INSURANCE BENEFITS

Mr. WAGNER. I ask unanimous consent that I may introduce a bill for reference to the Committee on Finance, and, preliminary to doing so, I wish to make a few observations.

At a time when the energies of the Nation are straining to build impregnable defenses against aggression from without, it is especially important and especially fitting to observe those memorable occasions in the last 7 years when our democracy took decisive measures to preserve and strengthen the way of life we are preparing to defend. Such an occasion was the adoption 5 years ago of the Social Security Act, which I had the honor and privilege of sponsoring.

In 1935 the Nation was confronted with a legacy of long years of struggle with adverse economic conditions. Industrial unemployment, destitute old age, and neglected youth, faced us on every side. It is essential to remember that these problems of insecurity, while accentuated by the depression, did not spring from the depression alone. They were the cumulative results of the whole development of our industrial system over the course of the present century. They were evidenced in the momentous questions which every working man and woman had been asking through the decades, "How can I provide for my family when I lose my job? How can I care for myself when I become too old to work?"

When President Roosevelt in June 1934 addressed a message to Congress and to the country raising these challenging questions, the problems seemed too complex for human understanding, much less human solution. We had made no satisfactory studies of unemployment, gathered no adequate statistics of old age, set up no functioning mechanisms for the Nation-wide solution of these difficulties. We were confronted with a vast and dissimilar population scattered throughout 48 States, each with separate conditions—some industrial, others agricultural; some urban, others rural. It would have taken a bold man to suggest that even within a decade we could have made any appreciable inroads upon problems so vast and terrifying in their magnitude.

But in the summer of 1934 the Roosevelt administration set about the task of making the beginning of social security in the United States, with a vigor and intelligence unparalleled in the history of American public affairs. Experts, gathered from every section of the country, spent long months in wearisome study, making their recommendations to the Congress. When the Congress met in 1935 it devoted itself to the critical analysis and improvement of these recommendations. After months of effort the Social Security Act emerged—a monument to the constructive endeavors of the Seventy-fourth Congress.

No other single act of Congress embodies such enormous advances in the security and dignity of the individual citizen. Under the law, as amended in 1939, accounts have been established for 50,000,000 wage earners under the old-age and survivors' insurance system. Over 28,000,000 wage earners have established wage credits under unemployment-insurance laws now operating in every State. To care for those already too old to work, almost 2,000,000 needy aged are receiving assistance under the State-Federal old-age pension plan. Effective programs have been established for State-Federal cooperation in aid of dependent and crippled children, the blind, maternal and child health, and public health.

Over $3,000,000,000 in benefits have been made available since 1935 under these insurance and assistance programs. And today, when the accelerating defense program is making unprecedented demands on the Nation's labor force, the United States Employment Service, now an integral part of our job-security program, is bringing together millions of idle workers and millions of available jobs. One has only to recall the confusion and waste motion in accomplishing a similar task during the World War emergency, to appreciate the invaluable contribution of this splendid and efficient arm of the national defense.

In all its phases the Social Security Act has been a bulwark of the American family and the American home, a stabilizing influence on our economic system, and a powerful safeguard against subversive forces that would undermine our political institutions. Above all, the law represents for all of us the proud expression of our faith in the processes and the ways of democracy in combating the ever-present enemies of poverty and insecurity in our midst.

In that spirit, which animated our original approach to the problem, we shall continue to go forward to perfect the law, improve its machinery, and extend its benefits to millions not yet covered by its terms.

The bill I am introducing today, at the request of the American Federation of Labor, proposes to amend the Social Security Act and the Internal Revenue Code in the following major respects:

First. The bill would cover under old-age and survivors' insurance all agricultural and domestic workers, employees of State and local governments, non-civil-service employees of the Federal Government, and employees of nonprofit, religious, charitable and educational institutions, except ordained ministers and members of religious orders performing their duties in such orders. These amendments extend the old-age insurance protection of the law to approximately 10,000,000 additional persons. As amended the act would embrace virtually all wage earners now excluded from its old-age insurance benefits. Existing pension systems affecting employees newly covered will be coordinated with the old-age insurance system.

These changes in coverage would make the Social Security Act vastly more comprehensive and would eliminate the inequities which now arise because workers frequently lose their insurance when they shift from covered to uncovered employment. The only excluded occupations, other than self-employment, would be some in which earnings are negligible and in which the employee is spending only a little time. After a few years there would be comparatively few persons who would not have rights to old-age or survivors' insurance.

Second. The bill would also extend coverage for unemployment compensation to about 5,000,000 additional employees, serving the Federal Government (in non-civil-service occupations), nonprofit institutions, and enterprises employing fewer than 8 employees. The agricultural-labor exemption is properly limited to bona fide agricultural workers as an incident to ordinary farming operations, as distinguished from manufacturing or commercial operations. Farm hands and domestic labor in private homes would continue to be excluded under these amendments, because of the greater difficulty of determining unemployment in these categories.

Third. The bill would increase the amount available for old-age assistance payments to poorer States. By changing from a flat to a variable-grant basis, the Federal Government would make it possible for the poorer States to pay old-age pensions as high as those paid by the wealthier States, in justice to the aged in every State and with consequent benefit to the whole Nation. The bill also provides for equitable distribution of Federal grants-in-aid on a State-wide basis, thus furthering the objective of fair treatment for all needy aged persons, irrespective of their place of residence, and establishes certain additional humanitarian standards to eliminate hardship in deserving individual cases.

I ask that the bill be referred to the Senate Committee on Finance, which has already established a special subcommittee to study various phases of the Social Security Act.

I am confident the bill will have the careful study of this subcommittee when it begins its work within the next few months.

In recent months the tragic lesson has been clearly taught that armaments alone cannot make a Nation secure against the total attack of wanton aggressors now despoiling a large portion of the civilized world. Armaments alone cannot protect a nation weakened by insecurity and social maladjustment. In our program of total defense, there must be no appeasement of the enemies within our gates, no relaxation of our drive toward the progressive achievement of Social Security for the men, women, and children of America.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD, as part of my remarks, statements published by the Social Security Board showing in detail the progress and achievements under the program.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Without objection, the bill will be received and referred as requested by the Senator from New York, and the statements referred to by him will be published in the RECORD.

The bill (S. 4269), to extend the coverage of the Social Security Act with respect to old-age and survivors' insurance and unemployment compensation, to provide for a variable basis for Federal grants to States for old-age assistance, to amend the Internal Revenue Code, and for other purposes, was read twice by its title and referred to the Committee on Finance.

FIVE YEARS OF SOCIAL SECURITY

The fifth birthday of the American social-security program will be observed on August 14, 1940. A measure of historic significance and enduring value, the social-security bill was laid before President Roosevelt for his signature on August 14, 1935. The two Houses of Congress had already endorsed it by an overwhelming nonpartisan vote—in the Senate, 77 affirmative votes and only 6 negative; in the House, 372 votes for the social-security measure and only 33 against. The President, in signing the bill, declared that passage of this measure alone was sufficient to make the work of Congress that session outstanding.

Four years later, on August 10, 1939, amendments which signally broadened and strengthened the social-security program were adopted by Congress, again by a sweeping nonpartisan vote, and signed by the President.

The United States Employment Service was coordinated with the Social Security Board's Bureau of Unemployment Compensation on July 1, 1939. This organization will play an important part in the program for national defense. It has been designated as the official agency to recruit men and women needed for jobs in the defense industries and to refer workers for training. Each one of the Nation-wide network of 1,500 full-time employment offices and 2,000 additional locations regularly visited by traveling representatives will do its part in mobilizing manpower to produce ships, tanks, airplanes, and army equipment.

One of the amendments to the Social Security Act passed in 1939 requires that State agencies administering social-security programs to which the Federal Government contributes must have personnel merit systems. All of the States have now adopted standards for a merit system of personnel administration. Placing personnel selection and administration on a merit basis will not only result in more efficient operation of the State public-assistance and employment-security programs but will tend to stabilize and improve Federal-State relations.

The Social Security Act, with its extensive programs of insurance against future need and direct assistance to those already in want, has benefited the American people greatly in this relatively short span of 5 years. Literally millions of Americans are already participating in the program and reaping its benefits; many more stand to gain in future years from its operation.

The old-age and survivors' insurance program protects millions of American wage earners and their families against the time when death or old age may put a stop to earnings. Fifty million workers now have social-security accounts, in which the Social Security Board will record their wages throughout their working years, which entitle them to benefits under this program. Monthly insurance payments to retired workers and their wives and to the widows and orphans of workers who have died are already being paid to 102,941 people. These payments amount to $1,924,000 a month. A total of $38,000,000 for all the various types of benefits provided had been paid out by June 30.

The employment-security program with its dual functions of unemployment compensation and employment service has meant the payment of weekly out-of-work benefits of over a billion dollars during a relatively short period, in most States a period of 2 years or less, and the filling of nearly 30,000,000 jobs since 1933, when the employment service was first established on its present basis. In 1939 and the first 6 months of 1940 alone over 5,000,000 jobs have been filled. More than 28,000,000 workers have earned credits toward benefits under State unemployment-compensation laws, and during the current month nearly 1,500,000 jobless workers are drawing such benefits.

The public-assistance program, which provides aid to the needy aged, the needy blind, and dependent children through Federal-State cooperation, is helping nearly 3,000,000 monthly. This includes 1,983,900 old people, 807,900 children, and 48,000 blind. Total monthly payments from Federal, State, and local funds to these groups of the needy come to $1,899,154,185—$1,502,009,565 for old-age assistance, $46,990,532 for aid to the blind, and $350,154,088 for aid to dependent children. During the month of August alone it is estimated that over $50,000,000 will be paid out for public assistance.

Altogether more than $3,000,000,000 has been distributed in direct cash payments during the past 5 years under these insurance and assistance programs.

Each dollar that contributes to this grand total of billions has not only been of direct benefit to the recipient but has aided the community in which he lives and the entire country by maintaining purchasing power. The moderate payments made under the social-security programs are used to pay for everyday living expenses and are thus piped right back into the stream of business from which they were drawn.

But the value of the social-security program to the American Nation cannot be measured in terms of dollars and cents alone. Socially, it has a greater significance—that of preserving the American home and protecting the foundations of family life. Confidence and hope have replaced the emotional strain and tension that formerly beset a family when earnings stopped and insecurity threatened. Real security depends not merely upon assurance against want, but upon the wiping out of the fear of want.

The social-security program which we now have is one capable of infinite extension and development, building on the foundation already laid. One line of development which has already received some consideration is that of extension of coverage under the two insurance programs to groups now excluded. For both old-age and survivors' insurance and unemployment compensation, protection is extended almost entirely to wage earners in commercial and industrial lines of work. The types of work covered by old-age and survivors' insurance, and the number in each industrial grouping is indicated by the following break-down of wage reports for the third quarter of 1939 for approximately 25,000,000 workers. This figure does not indicate the total number engaged in covering employment, as many may have wage credits previously or subsequently earned who were not employed during the 3 months of this quarter, or who may have been working in an excluded occupation at the time. These 25,000,000 workers are working in the following industries:

Construction	1,329,000
Transportation	961,000
Utilities	869,000
Wholesale and retail trade	5,150,000
Finance	236,000
Insurance	460,000
Real estate	470,000
Mining	776,000
Service	3,052,000
Professional service	283,000
Other industries	240,000

The industrial break-down for workers covered by State unemployment compensation laws is similar. Figures for 1938 show a monthly average employment of 21,000,000 people. Again, this figure does not indicate the total number engaged in employment covered by State unemployment compensation laws as it is a monthly average, and a cumulative figure of those who have wages credited to them under State laws is 28,000,000. Excluding the State of Pennsylvania, for which there are no industry figures, the number of workers by industries is as follows:

Manufacturing	7,921,000
Transportation, communication, and utilities	2,486,000
All others	2,500,000

The most immediate question with regard to amending the Social Security Act relates to workers covered by the insurance programs who may be conscripted for military training. The Social Security Board is studying proposed amendments which will assure that the benefit credits of persons drafted will not be jeopardized. Another amendment on which the Board has already stated its position relates to the development of some form of variable grant system which will enable poorer States to make more nearly adequate public assistance payments to their needy. The Board has also recommended the liberalization of unemployment compensation benefits, suggesting, on the basis of its study and experience, that the following changes could be made in State laws:

1. That the waiting period be reduced to 1 week;
2. That the minimum benefit payment be raised to at least $5 per week in all States;
3. That the weekly benefit rate be increased, and the maximum raised to at least $20 per week;
4. That the duration of benefits be lengthened, and in States with sufficient funds, benefits be paid for a uniform maximum period of 16 weeks to all eligible claimants;
5. That benefits for partial unemployment be paid in all States; and
6. That the eligibility and disqualification provisions of State laws be simplified so as to permit more prompt payment of benefits.

"There will be no retreat for social security as the result of the defense program," declared Social Security Board Chairman Arthur J. Altmeyer in a statement today reviewing the first 5 years of progress under the Social Security Act, which was signed August 14, 1935. "The stabilization of family income represented by the social-insurance and public-assistance programs has become more important than it was before. The demands of defense industries are putting the employment services 5 years ahead of schedule in achieving a more rational organization of the national labor market.

"No European nation has found it necessary to curtail its social-insurance program in the face of actual war," Mr. Altmeyer pointed out. "Here there is likelihood of judicious strengthening of the act as a bulwark for the internal defense of the American economic system.

"As a further contribution to stabilizing American family income, the employment service last year placed more than 3,500,000 persons in jobs, a figure which will be surpassed in the current year," Mr. Altmeyer continued. "The defense program relies today upon the State employment services coordinated through the Social Security Board for channeling skilled personnel to key industries."

He outlined the progress made under each of the major Social Security Board programs, as follows:

"There are more than 1,500 employment offices in strategically located communities throughout the country and more than 3,000 branch offices. These offices are taking their place as the central clearing houses for all types of labor. Through the State bureaus of employment security they facilitate the movement of labor from community to community, rendering prompt service to employers when a demand for labor arises They serve to check the fruitless and often tragic migration of labor to points where there is no real demand. A similar coordination of information through other affiliated State employment services throughout the Nation helps to rationalize the flow of labor across State lines.

"Since the national-defense program has occasioned new demands for special skills, this interstate clearance of information has put thousands of machinists, toolmakers, diemakers, mechanics, engineers, and other skilled and professional workers onto the job in industries manufacturing defense materials. Selective tests, which carefully check the skills of applicants, are being increasingly perfected to be sure that the most competent workers take the vital jobs.

"For workers who face the loss of pay checks when jobs fold up an unemployment-compensation system is now in operation in every State. This month nearly 1,500,000 unemployed workers are receiving compensation based upon their past wages. More than 28,000,000 workers have earned credit toward such benefits. More than $1,000,000,000 has been paid to unemployed workers since this system was established. So sound is its financial base that current reserves have led the Social Security Board to recommend that benefits be increased to a more adequate level.

"These employment-security programs, like the public assistance programs, are State administered. They meet certain standards as to their administration and their personnel must be selected upon the basis of an adequate merit system of their own; when they do, they receive Federal aid. They have served, thus, to improve vastly the professional quality of public administration in these fields."

Turning to the Federal social-insurance system, Chairman Altmeyer described its transition from a program which paid benefits only to aged individual workers to a system which provides current protection for the worker's entire family.

"The widows, orphans, or dependent parents of deceased workers insured under old-age and survivors' insurance are now eligible for monthly benefits ranging up to more than $80 per family per month," Chairman Altmeyer said. "Benefits received through the years may total as high as ten or fifteen thousand dollars or even more for a single family. Benefit payments for families, as provided by the amendments of August 1939, began in January of this year.

"After 7 months of operation 132,000 persons are receiving monthly benefits, which come to them as a matter of right under a contributory social-insurance system. Monthly benefits now being paid total more than $2,500,000 each month and the figure is rising steadily. More than 40,000,000 workers have wage credits toward such benefits. Benefits are soundly related to average monthly wages and hence to the joint contributions that workers and the employers have made. It is a financially sound system that is paying its own way."

Chairman Altmeyer pointed out that these programs protected workers, who had built up claims as the result of contributions by themselves or their employers. "Such contributory programs occupy the first line of defense against want," he said. "They enable those who have regular wages to plan for their own future. Behind them stands another program which provides income for those in need, but who have no regular wages and therefore cannot build up rights to social-insurance benefits. These are the public-assistance programs for the needy aged, the needy blind and for dependent children."

He described progress under these programs as follows:

"About 2,000,000 needy old people are receiving financial aid under the public-assistance provisions of the Social Security Act. All States and Territories have plans for giving old-age assistance, and within the past 5 years over $1,500,000,000 has been paid out from Federal, State, and local funds. The Federal Government pays approximately half of the cost.

"Approximately three-fourths of the States are receiving Federal funds to help them in giving assistance to dependent children. Nearly 808,000 needy children in over 335,000 homes are now being aided. To date a total of $350,000,000 has been paid in this form of aid from Federal, State, and local funds.

"Aid to needy blind people is provided in more than three-fourths of the States with the aid of Federal funds. About 48,000 persons are receiving this form of assistance and total payments have reached nearly $47,000,000.

"More than $3,000,000,000 have been paid out under the five benefit-paying programs."

RELIEF OF PERSONS INDUCTED INTO MILITARY AND NAVAL SERVICE

Mr. OVERTON. Mr. President, I ask consent to introduce a bill for reference to the Committee on Military Affairs. It is a bill to promote and strengthen the national defense by suspending enforcement of certain civil liabilities of certain persons serving in the Military and Naval Establishments.

This bill is in line with the amendment which I offered and the Senate adopted to the National Guard bill, and in line with the amendment I have proposed to the pending bill. The only difference is that the bill I now send to the desk covers a somewhat larger field and goes somewhat more into detail with reference to the relief to be given to those who are to be inducted into the military service for training under the pending legislation.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Without objection, the bill will be received and referred as requested by the Senator from Louisiana.

The bill (S. 4270) to promote and strengthen the national defense by suspending enforcement of certain civil liabilities of certain persons serving in the Military and Naval Establishments was read twice by its title and referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

SELECTIVE COMPULSORY MILITARY SERVICE—AMENDMENTS

Mr. BARBOUR, Mr. CLARK of Missouri, and Mr. O'MAHONEY each submitted an amendment intended to be proposed by them, respectively, to the bill (S. 4164) to protect the integrity and institutions of the United States through a system of selective compulsory military training and service, which were severally ordered to lie on the table and to be printed.

Mr. NEELY. Mr. President, I send to the desk an amendment intended to be proposed by me to the pending bill (S. 4164) and ask that it be read by the clerk, printed, and lie on the table.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Without objection, the amendment will be read.

The CHIEF CLERK. Section 5, subsection C, on page 20, line 13, after the word "duties", it is proposed to strike out the period and insert a comma and the words "and students who at the time of the approval of this act are preparing for the ministry in recognized theological or divinity schools."

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment will be received, printed, and lie on the table.

SELECTIVE COMPULSORY MILITARY SERVICE

The Senate resumed the consideration of the bill (S. 4164) to protect the integrity and institutions of the United States through a system of selective compulsory military training and service.

Mr. WHEELER. Mr. President, in view of the fact that a letter was read from my State yesterday intimating what the sentiment is in Montana, I desire to read a paragraph from a letter which I have received from Rev. Oscar L. Olsrud, an American preacher of Norwegian descent. He says, in a letter dated August 11, 1940:

> Today, following church services at Skaar, N. Dak., on the State boundary line, a vote was taken on the Burke-Wadsworth bill. There were 48 citizens present who took part in this vote. One voted in favor of passing the bill and 47 voted against passage. Here is a fair example of what the church-going people of the plains of eastern Montana and western North Dakota think about compulsory military training in peacetime.

I ask that the letter from this clergyman be inserted in the RECORD.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Without objection, it is so ordered.

The letter is as follows:

SAVAGE, MONT., August 10, 1940.

Senator B. K. WHEELER,
Washington, D. C.

DEAR SENATOR WHEELER: I was much grieved to hear that Col. Charles A. Lindbergh had in Congress been called the chief of "fifth columnists."

Colonel Lindbergh is a sincere man who has the best interests of the American people at heart. He is most loyal to traditional Americanism. His stand is harmonious with the Monroe Doctrine: Defend America but do not get involved in European wars. He has revealed a soundness of understanding and judgment superior to that of the average public servant.

One is tempted to suspect that any man who labels Colonel Lindbergh a "fifth columnist" is himself a "fifth column" agent of the selfish interests who are attempting to involve this Nation in war.

The great masses of American people are opposed to entrance into this war. If Congress, contrary to the desire of the people, proceeds to pass legislation leading to war, then the principles of democracy are being tragically violated and we have chaos, more horrible than can be imagined, to look forward to for America.

To pass the Burke-Wadsworth compulsory military training bill, against the wish of the people, is an act of dictatorship, not of democracy.

The "fifth-column" activity of the special interests is the most dangerous foe we have to contend with in America today.

With millions of other Americans, my sincere prayer is: "God bless America." To be consistent with this prayer, we must keep ourselves informed on principles of truth and justice and not permit ourselves to be deceived by false leaders.

We much appreciate, Senator WHEELER, what you are doing to uphold the rights of the common people.

Respectfully yours,
OSCAR L. OLSRUD.

Enclosed: Citizens' vote on Burke-Wadsworth bill, 47 to 1 against passage.

Mr. JOHNSON of Colorado. Mr. President, the Senate Committee on Military Affairs worked out an amendment to the Burke-Wadsworth bill deferring the military training of certain groups, ministers, and others. The amendment was not satisfactory to all the churches. On August 12 I submitted amendments which do have their approval, and which I should like to have made a part of my remarks, to be followed by a statement explaining my amendments in detail.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Without objection, it is so ordered.

The amendments are as follows:

Amendments intended to be proposed by Mr. JOHNSON of Colorado to the bill (S. 4164) to protect the integrity and institutions of the United States through a system of selective compulsory military training and service, viz: On page 20, between lines 2 and 3, insert the following:

"(c) Regular or duly ordained ministers of religion and students who are preparing for the ministry in theological or divinity schools recognized as such for more than 1 year prior to the date of enactment of this act shall be exempt from training and service (but not from registration) under this act."

On page 20, line 3, strike out "(c)" and insert in lieu thereof "(d)."

On page 20, line 9, beginning with the word "interest", strike out all down to and including "duties" in line 13 and insert in lieu thereof "interest."

On page 20, lines 15 and 16, strike out "except in the case of regular or duly ordained ministers."

The statement submitted by Mr. JOHNSON of Colorado is as follows:

The amendment to S. 4164 which I have introduced is designed to exempt from the training and service in the land and naval forces of the United States ministers of religion and students for the ministry. This amendment, I believe, is satisfactory to the various religious denominations within the United States. It has been drafted in such a manner as to eliminate, insofar as it is possible, any opportunity to abuse the right of a bona fide minister of religion or divinity student to be exempt from compulsory military training.

I contend that such an exemption is necessary. Religion, of necessity, must have a place of importance in a democracy, and the function of a democratic government is to encourage in every way possible the free exercise of religion. It is obvious and beyond argument that to subject ministers of religion to compulsory military training is to seriously interfere with, if not completely to suspend, this right.

The maintenance of this ministry in a democratic society demands and has as a necessary corollary the education of men who will continue the beneficial and necessary exercise of this function. Therefore I have made provision for the exemption of students who are preparing for the ministry.

May I bring to the attention of Senators the fact that the provisions of my amendment are similar to the provisions of the Draft Act of 1917. That act exempted from the draft regular or duly ordained ministers of religion and students preparing for the ministry.

In presenting this amendment to the Senate I assume that those persons charged with the administration of this act will give to religion its proper place in a democratic form of government, and to this end will adopt such rules and regulations as will embody the accepted definitions of the terms "regular or duly ordained ministers of religion" as these terms are meant within this amendment.

A duly ordained minister of religion as used in my amendment should mean a person who has been ordained in accordance with the ceremonial, ritual, or discipline of a church, religious sect, or organization established on the basis of a community of faith and belief, doctrines, and practices of a religious character, to preach and to teach the doctrines of such church, sect, or organization and to administer the rites and ceremonies thereof in public worship, and who as his regular and customary vocation preaches and teaches the principles of religion and administers the ordinances of public worship as embodied in the creed or principles of such church, sect, or organization.

A regular minister of religion, as used in my amendment, should mean a person who as his customary vocation preaches and teaches the principles of a religion of a church, a religious sect, or organization of which he is a member, without having been formally ordained as a minister of religion, and who is recognized by such church, sect, or organization as a regular minister.

Mr. ASHURST. Mr. President, yesterday I presumed to solicit the attention of the Senate to point out that there is evidence that the War Department has not with strict fidelity enforced and observed the act of June 4, 1920, authorizing 1-year enlistments at the option of the soldier, not at the option of the War Department, and I read from a speech of Representative MICHENER, of Michigan. I now read again from Mr. MICHENER'S speech of August 12:

I called up the United States Army recruiting station on Pennsylvania Avenue, in the city of Washington, by telephone, advising that I was a young man who wanted to enlist in the Army for a period of 1 year during this emergency. I was promptly told that 1-year enlistments were not being received by the recruiting stations and that the shortest perod for which I could enlist was 3 years. I called the attention of the officer to the letter from The Adjutant General's office which I have included in these remarks, and then I told the recruiting officer who I was and he then admitted that 1-year enlistments were possible under the law, but gave me the substance of the regulations and advised that recruiting stations discouraged 1-year enlistments.

I have received a telegram signed "M. Doughty, 410 Elizabeth Manor Apartments, Upper Darby, Pa." Upper Darby is in Delaware County, Pa. The telegram is as follows:

Army recruiting station, Philadelphia, says 3-year enlistment only. Why?

Mr. President, those favoring the pending conscription or draft bill or selective-service bill—the latter being terms euphemistically used by those who dislike the word "draft," but the words mean the same thing—are asking us to grant to the War Department enormous powers, powers that run to the roots of government, and deal vitally with the plans and destiny of millions of young men; yet the very Department asking these vast powers have not faithfully and with strict fidelity employed the powers already granted. Some of the recruiting stations have misinformed applicants and have discouraged them when they attempted to enlist for 1 year. It should be remembered that the act of 1920 gives to applicants—not to the War Department—the option of enlisting for 1 year, if the applicant so chooses.

Mr. President, those who ask that greater power be granted to them should first prove to the country that they have with fidelity and in good faith observed and employed the lesser powers already granted to them. Those who have been lacking in good faith and have been remiss in small matters are likely to be remiss and unfaithful in grave and larger concerns.

Mr. MCKELLAR. Mr. President, I am about to discuss for a few moments the compulsory military-service bill. I shall thank Senators not to question me until I finish. Then, if there are any questions to be asked, I shall be glad to answer them if I can.

Mr. President, the pending bill providing for compulsory military service at a time when we are not at war, but when we are grievously threatened with war, is a measure which I think each Senator should approach with as nearly an unbiased mind as it is possible for him to have. I wish to approach it in that spirit. I feel that our country is greatly threatened, and I have but one desire. That desire is to act in all matters pertaining to preparedness with an eye single to our country's good. That should be the purpose as to each bill passed in the Congress, of course; but in the case of a compulsory military-service bill, under which so many of our young men will be called upon to prepare for military defense of our country, we should be a thousand times more careful to leave out all prejudice, all passion, all preconceived ideas, and think only of a measure best calculated to bring about a successful defense of our great country. In discussing and voting on this measure, and any amendments that may be offered to it, this is the outstanding purpose that I hope to follow.

With the general plan of the original Burke-Wadsworth bill I was unable to agree. The original plan seemed chimerical and almost hysterical. Its first effect would have been to give us a lopsided economic and industrial system; and there never was a time when our industrial system should be more persistently kept in mind. Others have pointed out the specific differences between the two measures, and I shall not go into a detailed comparison. Suffice it to say that in the very outset the Burke-Wadsworth plan seemed impossible, as it provided that all able-bodied men should undergo compulsory military service, and provided for the registration of all male citizens in the United States between the ages of 18 and 65, or a total of about 42,000,000 men, with probably half of them unfitted by nature for military duty because of advanced years. The authors of the plan were no doubt sincere, but they certainly must have been victims of hysteria. I do not reflect upon either Senator BURKE or Representative WADSWORTH, because I am sure they think about the original bill as I do. They did not prepare the bill. It was prepared by others. They introduced it, and are entitled to that credit.

In the committee bill those subject to service are confined to the ages between 21 and 31, amounting to a total of about 12,000,000 men. This total, while I hope it is much larger than we shall ever have to train, is likewise hedged about by reasonable limitations. The President is to call for training a reasonable number of men, believed to be not more than 400,000 for the first 6 months and 400,000 for the second 6 months, that being as many as trained officers of our Army believe they could train with the funds they will have.

It must be remembered that Congress has complete supervision over these numbers through its control of the amount of money appropriated for training such men. The training of these men will be a very expensive thing, and only as many can be trained as the Congress shall appropriate money for. I am quite sure that the Appropriations Committees of the two Houses will keep our military authorities in bounds at all times. Our people can easily see that in this provision their representatives have perfect control over the numbers to be trained.

Another outstanding difference between the two bills is that the volunteer system, which has always been in vogue in this country, was done away with by the Burke-Wadsworth bill, and the committee bill includes the volunteer system as a part of our military system. In other words, what the committee bill does is to guarantee that if trouble should break out we would have a sufficient number of our citizens of military age trained for our country's defense. I want to congratulate the committee on having brought out such a sensible, workable, efficient plan of raising an army. To my mind the plan can hardly be improved upon. The bill shows on its face that the law is to be temporary, and intended for the emergency only, in that it is to become inoperative on and after May 15, 1945.

In other words, we are not changing our policy from a voluntary system to a conscript system, as has been argued. The only difference is that ahead of actual war we are putting into effect a compulsory system of training.

Indeed, Mr. President, after a careful consideration of the committee bill, it seems to me it should meet the objections of every person sincerely interested in his country's defense. The volunteer system has been greatly improved by reducing the volunteer enlistment period from a period of 3 years to a period of 1 year, and the conscription feature of the bill has been improved by giving credit to a State or subdivision by the number of volunteers there, such number to be deducted from their conscription quota.

The committee bill further provides for local draft boards to select the young men required for military training. It provides for proper exceptions, as of a young married man with wife and children. It also provides for an exception in the case of conscientious objectors. This last may be all right, but I regret to say that I have not much sympathy for conscientious objectors. I recall in the last World War one of the most famous of conscientious objectors, Sergeant York, of Tennessee, went into the Army notwithstanding his objections, and made the greatest individual soldier of them all.

Mr. President, our present Regular Army consists of 180,000 men, and we have recently increased that number to 375,000 men in the Regular Establishment. This was done last spring, and since that time our Army officials have set out a monthly quota to be secured by the volunteer enlistment plan until the 375,000 are secured. Under normal conditions it will be April 1941 before we reach the 375,000 men in the Regular Army. Under present conditions it would never do for us to be without a regularly trained army until April 1941. I think we all realize this.

It is true that the Senate has but recently passed a bill authorizing the President to call our National Guard, numbering perhaps 225,000 men, into the service of the United States. These are, for the most part, trained and seasoned men, and adding this number to the 375,000 would give the United States a trained army of 600,000 men by April 1941.

Mr. President, heretofore when war has come to us we have never used compulsory military training prior to the outbreak of the war. Invariably we have gone into wars on the volunteer system, but before the war was over, in our serious wars, we have always had to adopt a plan of compulsory service. So it seems to me the only question is whether we will adopt provision for compulsory service at this time, or put it off to a little later, to go into effect in the event of a real emergency. I imagine most of us in the Senate would prefer that that course be pursued at this time; but, Mr. President, if war comes to us in the near future, it is certain that it will come in a different and quicker way from what it has ever come before.

Modern warfare is different from any kind of warfare that has gone before. The use in modern warfare of airplanes, tanks, submarines, and other modernized mechanisms makes it absolutely necessary for America to be in a position to meet these modern conditions. Should a foreign foe invade us or invade our Western Hemisphere, which we have long engaged to protect under the Monroe Doctrine, we must be able to meet such a foe with the same kind of weapons and the same kind of trained use of such weapons as they may bring against us. We have just appropriated billions of dollars for building tanks, large and small; for building artillery, large and small; for building machine guns, large and small; for building airplanes; and for the manufacture of ammunition to fit these various weapons of defense. The use of these weapons, great and small, requires the most accurate and painstaking training of the men who use them. In the olden days, when all that was necessary was to train a man how to shoot an army rifle and how to get out of the way of enemy rifles, how to attack and how to retreat, the matter was simple enough; but in these days, when we must have young men trained to operate tanks, to operate machine guns, to operate artillery, and to operate airplanes, it is, of course, necessary to give them the very best possible training. It would be cruel and inhuman for this Government to induct into the Army young men without training.

Indeed, Mr. President, let me add that, in my judgment, to induct young men into the Army, whether volunteers or by conscription, who have not had training, to use the highly developed mechanisms employed in war, would be criminal upon our part, and I do not think we should do it, and that is what we might have to do unless the men were trained in advance. We are now building these various weapons, and in order that our preparation might go along hand in hand with the acquisition of this equipment, we should at once transfer into the Army a sufficient number of young men to use these weapons after they have been manufactured, and we should prepare them to use the weapons intelligently.

But, Mr. President, it may be contended that there is no reason at this time for these unusual preparations. A year ago I would certainly have been opposed to these preparations, but when I see a great nation in Europe preparing and accumulating vast stores of the war weapons I have described, when I see that nation, with her men trained to use those weapons with the most perfect effect, and after such accumulation of weapons and the training of her men I find that nation overrunning nearly all of her neighbors, first Austria, then Czechoslovakia, then Poland, then Norway, then Denmark, then Holland, then Belgium, and lastly France, although France was alleged to have had the best-trained army in the world, with more men than any other army; and when I see the death struggle now going on between that nation and the great empire of Great Britain, with the issue in doubt, I feel that there is such an emergency in this country that as careful and prudent legislators, having eyes single to the welfare of our country, we must take every needful step to defend ourselves. It is argued by some that that European nation will not undertake to invade us. Indeed, there are many prominent people in that nation who say that they do not intend to invade us. Ah, Mr. President, I remember that there was no intention to take any other territory after Austria, and there was no intention of taking any other territory after Czechoslovakia, and after Poland, and after Norway, Denmark, Holland, Belgium, and France; but those promises were not kept. So that, judging the future by the past, it is nothing but due diligence for us to look after our own affairs and prepare ourselves for a proper defense.

Again, Mr. President, Congress has already shown that we believe it is necessary to prepare thoroughly, otherwise we would not have spent billions of dollars to build up a great army and a great navy and a great air force. We have already passed measures making great appropriations and still, unless we have the men we cannot be sure of our defense. It is true that we might get the men under the volunteer system. We will still have that system under the bill. It is not interfered with by the pending bill in the slightest, except to make it better, but Mr. President, by the bill we are assured that whether or not the volunteer system is fully effective, we are absolutely guaranteed the number of men that may be necessary to defend our homes and firesides, our Government, and our people.

The taking of 400,000 young men over 21 years of age each 12 months will not unduly interfere with our economic or industrial progress. The taking of young men over 21 will not unduly interfere with the education of our young men. Young men who are skilled mechanics can be put in that part of the Army where skilled mechanics are necessary. As I look at the bill, its purpose is to make it absolutely certain that we will have young men trained for the Army, but they are to be taken under such conditions as to cause a minimum of interference with our economic and industrial system. We found that selective draft system was fair, and that it was fairly enforced in the last World War. I believe that, with that experience it will be even more fairly enforced at the present time.

I feel that I should also call attention to section 8 of the bill, which in substance provides that if an enrollee called into the service has a place with the Government, at the conclusion of his military service he is to be restored to the place he held at the time of being taken, without loss of seniority or other benefits.

If he is in the employ of any State, the State is urged to restore him to his State position and no doubt will do so.

If he is with a private company or person, he is to be restored, and if the company or person fails to restore him it shall be regarded as an unfair labor practice within the meaning of the National Labor Relations Act.

These provisions are exceedingly important, and especially important to skilled and other labor, and, to my mind, should be faithfully carried out. While there might be some doubt as to the legal right of restoration with private employers, I think these provisions should remain in the bill, and that every effort should be made to restore the men drafted to their former positions at their former salaries and without loss of seniority and the like. To the men who labor with their hands this is all important, and I regard it as a very wise provision of the bill.

Mr. President, I believe the pay of the Army should be increased. It is true that we furnish each man with food and shelter, clothing, and other items, but $21 a month for his service is very small. My intention is to vote for probably $30 a month as the pay of the men.

I regret exceedingly that we are confronted with this great danger, but I feel that I would be recreant in my duty as a United States Senator, recreant in my duty as an American citizen, if, knowing these facts, I refused to take the necessary steps to see that we shall have no lack of manpower to go along with the mechanized instruments of warfare for which we have already provided as a proper defense to our Nation.

I feel that I should be recreant in my duty if hereafter I were to vote to conscript into our Army young men without any training at all, and for that reason I believe it is my duty to vote for the bill substantially as reported out by the Senate Committee on Military Affairs.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. Chaffee, one of its reading clerks, announced that the House had passed without amendment the bill (S. 3954) relating to the issuance by the Secretary of the Interior of a patent to the State of Minnesota for certain lands in that State.

The message also announced that the House had agreed to the amendment of the Senate to each of the following bills of the House:

H. R. 7826. An act for the relief of R. F. Brazelton; and

H. R. 9158. An act to amend the act entitled "An act for the protection of certain enlisted men of the Army," approved August 19, 1937, and for other purposes.

SELECTIVE COMPULSORY MILITARY SERVICE

Mr. TAFT obtained the floor.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Eighty-seven Senators have answered to their names. A quorum is present.

Mr. TAFT. Mr. President, I wish to state to the Senate my reasons for opposing the adoption at this time of a compulsory draft of men into the United States Army. No measure considered since I have been in the Senate has sought to change so much the basic theory of American life, or, in my opinion, will have a more profound effect on our political and governmental ideas. There is a general agreement that the bill, in the words of the distinguished chairman of the Military Affairs Committee can be justified only by a tragic necessity. The question we must consider, therefore, is whether or not a necessity exists. I am opposed to the bill because, in my opinion, no necessity exists requiring such tragic action.

Of course, I realize that some persons look on the bill as a good thing in itself even in peacetime and when no emergency exists. The sponsor of the bill, the Military Training Camps Association, has advocated the bill, or something like it, ever since 1920. Secretary Stimson, Assistant Secretary Patterson, Col. Julius Adler, who testified that he wanted to train a reserve of 20,000,000 men, Mr. Grenville Clark and others who testified for the bill have been members of this group for many years. But their appeal was overwhelmingly rejected before the European war. They have availed themselves of the present emergency to propose this bill, at first without administration support. They have established a national emergency committee, which is now soliciting contributions to a fund of $100,000 "to help enact the Burke-Wadsworth bill into legislation." This money is apparently to be used to bring down on Congressmen and Senators a flood of telegrams and letters and to spread all over the country the belief that anyone who opposes the bill is un-American and unpatriotic. They are deliberately inspiring a Nation-wide propaganda out of their offces at 28 West Forty-fourth Street, New York City, and I may say that their action, of course, deprives of all force the inspired communications which Congressmen and Senators hereafter receive.

Mr. President, I ask that there be inserted in the RECORD as part of my remarks the letter of the Military Training Camps Association and the leaflet which accompanies it, after I read a few extracts from the letter. This is a letter which has gone out under the letterhead of the Military Training Camps Association National Emergency Committee:

When you write your check payable to James G. Harbord, treasurer, make the amount proportionate to your stake in American freedom.

* * * * * * *

Can patriotic Americans move quickly enough to provide an adequate defense?

Apparently anyone who opposes the bill is not a patriotic American.

At the bottom of the letter is the following:

Write or telegraph informing your Congressman and Senators that you approve the Burke-Wadsworth selective service military training bill.

The names of the Senators and Representatives of that region are printed on the back of the letter. Enclosed is a pamphlet in which the National Emergency Committee, with complete modesty, says that—

The National Emergency Committee, many members of which founded the Plattsburg training camps which gave the American armies 65,000 line officers in the World War, has assumed the task of giving leadership and guidance to those who believe in the principle of compulsory military training and in the pressing necessity for its immediate adoption.

Further:

The people must be given every encouragement to make known their views to their chosen representatives.

* * * * * * *

Most urgent: Write or wire your Senators and Congressmen immediately, telling them you approve of this military training bill.

The money is to be used—

To arouse all the citizenry to an appreciation of the grave dangers before us; to continue an adequate campaign of public education; to make articulate the large majority of the voters who believe in the adoption of compulsory military training now—the National Emergency Committee needs immediately the sum of $100,000.

I ask unanimous consent that the letter and the accompanying pamphlet be printed in the RECORD as part of my remarks.

There being no objection, the letter and pamphlet were ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

NATIONAL EMERGENCY COMMITTEE
MILITARY TRAINING CAMPS ASSOCIATION,
New York, N. Y., August 8, 1940.

DEAR MRS. TAFT: Those who believe in selective compulsory military training and its immediate adoption make the compelling argument that with the equal opportunity offered to all citizens of the United States there goes the equal obligation to serve.

A corollary of this, in the judgment of the National Emergency Committee, means that citizens able to give—and who believe we must immediately adopt this form of military training—should willingly contribute to help enact the Burke-Wadsworth bill into legislation.

Time is too short to permit us to make a wide national appeal for the $100,000 fund imperatively needed for the purposes set forth in the enclosed leaflet. When you write your check payable to James G. Harbord, treasurer, make the amount proportionate to your stake in American freedom.

Delay has cursed the cause of the Allies day in and day out. This is a major test of the democracy we seek to protect. Can patriotic Americans move quickly enough to provide an adequate defense?

Part of the answer—your part—may be found in your response to this appeal.

Sincerely yours,

ALLEN L. LINDLEY.

AMERICA'S MOST IMPORTANT ISSUE

An astonishingly simple issue now confronts the American people, as predatory nations gain in power and arrogance.

Is the United States worth fighting for? Yes.

Are we going to fight if necessary? Again the answer is yes.

Are we ready—have we the arms, the equipment, the organization, the trained fighters? The answer is decidedly no.

EASY PICKINGS—NOW

The United States is easily the richest nation in the world today—and easily the least prepared of any of the great nations.

Nobody can improvise an army overnight, in a few weeks, or even in a few months. Poorly organized and untrained millions amount to little. No wolf is alarmed by the size of the flock of sheep. His only difficulty is in picking out the one he wants.

You can't buy time. Modern wars come like an avalanche, not like the glacier. Undeveloped military resources, billions of dollars in equipment and mechanisms—all these are quite useless unless we have a thoroughly trained and adequate manpower in the Army, the Navy, the marines, and the air.

Many Americans understand these facts; others are learning them rapidly.

THERE IS ONE ANSWER

The National Emergency Committee of the Military Training Camps Association is thoroughly convinced that the only quick and positive answer to the situation in which Americans now find themselves is the speedy enactment of legislation for selective compulsory military training and service.

All alternatives to such selective compulsory training, the Committee believes, are far too likely sometime in the future to be characterized by the tragic words: "Too late and too little."

The National Emergency Committee, many members of which founded the Plattsburg Training Camps which gave the American armies 65,000 line officers in the World War, has assumed the task of giving leadership and guidance to those who believe in the principle of compulsory military training, and in the pressing necessity for its immediate adoption.

WHAT REMAINS TO BE DONE

As debate proceeds in the United States Senate and House of Representatives on the Burke-Wadsworth bill, it is imperative that democratic processes obtain. The American people must know all of the essential facts and implications of the entire program; debate must be fair and open; the people must be given every encouragement to make known their views to their chosen representatives.

This country belongs to all the people. They should be urged to speak up and let their elected servants know exactly what they want done about our national defense, and such public opinion must be based upon knowledge of the facts.

The Gallup poll, whose reliability has not been successfully challenged on any issue, reports that 67 percent of the American voters are now in favor of the adoption of a system of compulsory military training. Another survey shows that 87 percent of the press favors the legislation.

Opposition forces are intensifying their efforts, as shown by reports of letters and telegrams coming to Senators and Congressmen, seeking to make it appear that a large proportion of American voters are against the plan. Disproportionate minority pressure is an old story in American politics, but the device can be met and defeated.

WHY FUNDS ARE NEEDED QUICKLY

To arouse all the citizenry to an appreciation of the grave dangers before us—to continue an adequate campaign of public education—to make articulate the large majority of the voters who believe in the adoption of compulsory military training now—the National Emergency Committee needs immediately the sum of $100,000. This is an investment of less than one-tenth of a cent for each American. Funds will be used for organization work, reprinting of articles and speeches, telephone, telegraph, publicity, postage, office and clerical staffs, etc. This is a cause that cannot wait; national unpreparedness means national calamity.

The more enthusiastically and overwhelmingly the Burke-Wadsworth military training bill is approved in the Senate and House of Representatives, the better the dictator nations will understand what the action means. This is a fight that America must not lose! By contributing to this $100,000 fund the committee believes you can help assure a national security that we desperately need.

Most urgent: Write or wire your Senators and Congressmen immediately, telling them you approve of this military training bill.

NATIONAL EMERGENCY COMMITTEE, MILITARY TRAINING CAMPS ASSOCIATION,
28 West Forty-fourth Street, New York, N. Y.
GRENVILLE CLARK, Chairman.
Maj. Gen. JAMER G. HARBORD, Treasurer.

Mr. TAFT. In the atmosphere of excitement and prejudice created by this kind of propaganda, it is difficult to consider calmly the issues which are really involved. But I do desire to discuss the actual situation which exists today, and the necessity for the revolutionary measure before us. I take it that the majority of the Senate does not agree on compulsory military training as a peacetime measure. They do agree with the distinguished chairman of the Military Affairs Committee, who said the other day in the Senate:

> The compulsory system is added in the present bill to the volunteer system to meet an immediate emergency in which the time element is a tragic necessity and because the volunteer system cannot obtain the necessary numbers within the time needed in the Nation's defense.

So the question is not the general advantages of military training, but it is whether there is now an absolute necessity for this kind of tragic action.

2. TERMS OF THE BILL

The Burke-Wadsworth bill now proposes that a great registration system be set up, under which there shall be registered 11,300,000 men between the ages of 21 and 31 years; that draft boards shall be established all over the United States, involving the employment of perhaps 200,000 persons appointed by the President in an election year; and that all registrants shall be liable for "training and service in the land and naval forces of the United States." Men from 18 to 35 may volunteer. It is said that that authorizes a volunteer system to be tried out, but, in my opinion, it does no such thing. If we provide for registration and give the Army power to draft men by force, the volunteer system will never have a fair trial; there will be no incentive to give it a fair trial. If, by a mere scratch of the pen, they can get 400,000 men into the service, nobody is going to all the great additional expense of a volunteer effort if it is known that men can easily be obtained without such volunteer effort. No.; this is a draft bill, and it does not contain in it any volunteer alternative.

When the United States is not at war, every man drafted shall "serve for a training period of 12 consecutive months," unless during that period Congress shall declare that the national interest is imperiled, in which case he shall serve until Congress relieves him.

Of course, if there is an emergency, if we need these men Congress will so declare. So the term of service is not merely a year; it is an indefinite period.

If the country is at war, his 12-month service may be indefinitely extended for the duration of the war. After the required period of 12 months, each man is transferred to the Reserve for 10 years, and during that period is subject to such training and service as may be required by law; provided, that if he completes 2 years' additional service in the Regular Army or the active National Guard, he shall be released from any further obligations as a member of the Reserve.

There are a few automatic exemptions, and the President is given power to defer training and service for men in essential industries, and for men who have persons dependent on them. This deferment, however, has to be made on the basis of the status of each individual rather than by any broad classes, so that the President, or the draft boards to whom his power may be delegated, will have almost arbitrary power to determine who shall be deferred and who shall not be deferred. The number of nondeferred men having been determined, those to be drafted will be selected by lot.

There are approximately 11,300,000 men between the specified ages, and our experience in the World War indicates that about 65 percent will be placed in deferred classes, leaving approximately 4,000,000 men in the first nonexempt class. Approximately 1,150,000 more men come of age each year, of whom approximately 60 percent, or 690,000, will be in the first class. So there will be available 4,000,000 men immediately, and 700,000 additional every year. The chairman of the Military Affairs Committee states that it is planned to call 400,000, or 1 in 10 of the first class, on October 1, 1940, and 400,000 more on April 1, 1941, but that plans beyond that date have not been made. This means that about 1 in 5 of the nondeferred eligibles are to be called during the next 12 months, to be determined entirely by chance.

I have tried to find out just what these 11,300,000 men are actually doing at the present time. Apparently about 9,000,000 are employed in regular employment; 2,000,000 are unemployed or partially employed; 300,000 are in college or professional schools.

In other words, the great bulk of these men have finished their education and have started on their life work, and they have started, as a rule, in some occupation where their success depends on steady, serious application to their jobs, and, regardless of whether or not they are restored to their positions, a year's service will seriously set back the progress they might otherwise make.

It may be pointed out also that it will be very easy for any man to escape the draft by marrying, provided the lady has no other means of support. While this is not a serious problem in time of war, it is likely to become a very serious problem in time of peace, when the sense of emergency is not so strongly felt.

The bill is for a period of only 5 years, but for all practical purposes it proposes a permanent system, or at least one which will last until the whole world condition changes. If it were only to meet the immediate emergency, it could be limited to 1 year, or 2 years at most. So far as the bill which the Congress enacts for 5 years is concerned, I think we may regard it as permanent legislation.

3. THE BILL DOES NOT PROPOSE UNIVERSAL COMPULSORY MILITARY TRAINING

Many of the letters which I receive advocate the bill on the ground that it imposes universal compulsory military training on all the youth of the United States; that such training is good for American boys; that it teaches them discipline and hardens their character. The writers feel that it should be part of the educational system of the United States, and that the Federal Government should undertake to provide that part of every boy's education. I think we should understand clearly that this bill proposes no such system. Personally, I do not agree with the argument that there should be such universal military training; but I think there is a better argument for it than there is for the draft at the present moment. It would put the Federal Government in the business of education, where it does not belong. It would require the training of 1,150,000 boys every year at a cost of about $1,250,000,000 a year, to which we would soon have added demands for special pensions and other expenses. It would create a potential army vastly in excess of any possible needs, and militarize this country to an extent which I feel to be most unwise.

But, in any event, this bill does not propose such a system. It is not going to take the boys as they graduate from high school and give them a year's training. It takes young men long after their education is completed, and when 9,000,000 out of 11,300,000, or 80 percent, are already engaged in their life work. It is not universal, for it proposes only to take one-fifth of those older men who are not placed in deferred classes. It proposes only to take 7 percent of the total registrants. It is therefore neither universal military training, nor is it education at all.

4. THE BILL REALLY PROVIDES A COMPULSORY SELECTIVE DRAFT FOR ARMY SERVICE

Whatever the purpose of the original sponsors of the bill, as now amended and advocated by the administration, it is a compulsory selective draft to provide a larger Army to meet what is considered the immediate emergency. We have today a Regular Army of 270,000. By the time this draft can be put into force, it will amount, by routine enlistment methods, to 335,000, and no difficulty is anticipated in bringing it up to the full authorized strength of 375,000 by adding 40,000 for the Air Corps as new airplanes become available. We have never had any difficulty in getting volunteers for the air force. We have just authorized the President to call out the National Guard and the Reserve, which will add about 370,000 to this number. Since a large number of these, however, are Reserve officers, it is fair to say that without the passage of this bill we can have available under arms, within 3 months, an Army of about 650,000, if we can get the equipment for them, which I do not believe we can.

Mr. REED. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. TAFT. Certainly.

Mr. REED. I am very much interested in the statement the Senator from Ohio has just made, just as I was in the statement of the Senator from Montana [Mr. WHEELER] yesterday. I have talked with a number of Army officers, who are not willing naturally to be quoted, but they are very frank about their position. With them it is not a question of getting a sufficient number of men to match the equipment or to fill the authorized ranks of the Regular Army. With them it is a professional preference for a conscription system; and they are very frank in saying so. Some Army officers of very high rank with whom I have talked think that we cannot use more than 750,000 men against any offensive that might be likely to be directed against us, and they are very frank to say that we can get 750,000 men through voluntary enlistments in addition to the National Guard which we have authorized to be called out. That, however, is not the way they want to do it. This question is not one of the necessities of the United States; it is a question of the preference of the professional military force as to how men shall be brought into the service.

Mr. TAFT. I thank the Senator from Kansas, and I think there can be no question that we can have within 3 months an army of 650,000 men under arms under our present system.

Mr. REED. May I say I entirely agree with the Senator from Ohio as to that.

Mr. TAFT. I understand the Senator's position. On August 5, when I asked the distinguished chairman of the Military Affairs Committee what was the total number of men who should be under arms, he replied that he thought we should have, as soon as we could get them, between six hundred and seven hundred thousand men, if not a larger number. We can have them within 3 months without this bill.

Mr. ASHURST. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. TAFT. I yield.

Mr. ASHURST. The able Senator a moment ago said that under the present system we would have 600,000 or more men. I am sure the Senator must mean that under the present law and the recent bill passed by the Senate calling into service the units of the National Guard.

Mr. TAFT. I thank the Senator for the correction. What I had in mind was that when the National Guard and Reserve bill shall have been passed we will have 650,000 men available.

Mr. ASHURST. Mr. President, will the Senator yield further?

Mr. TAFT. I yield.

Mr. ASHURST. In the criticisms I made lately against the War Department for its disregard of, if not its flagrant opposition to, the law permitting 1-year enlistments, I wish to exempt Secretary of War Stimson from that criticism, because he has not been an incumbent in that office sufficiently long to have been guilty of this disregard of the law of 1920 which permitted 1-year enlistments.

Mr. President, I will not say it was a foul action on the part of the War Department—that word is too strong—but it was an unfair action on the part of the War Department premeditately to discourage 1-year enlistments. There is some evidence to show that disingenuousness and a lack of frankness was employed by some of the recruiting officers in telling young men they could not enlist for 1 year when the law of 1920 permitted 1-year enlistments, and furthermore granted that option to the applicant, not to the War Department. It seems obvious that if the War Department had been frank and ingenuous, and had told the young men they might enlist for a year, there would have been no serious remissness, no backwardness in enlistment, among the young men of this country.

Mr. TAFT. I thank the Senator for his contribution.

General Marshall apparently desires to have by next spring an army of 900,000 men under arms, according to his testimony before the committee, at least partially trained. He proposes to call 400,000 under the draft and put them directly into the Regular Army and National Guard units, building up the units of the Regular Army to 500,000 and the units of the National Guard to 400,000. There are to be no special training camps, but these men are to be trained right in the existing units and become part of such units, at least until their year expires in October 1941.

General Marshall's testimony is very clear. He says:

> No, sir; that is not only a very simple way of doing it, but at the same time it does what I think we urgently need to do at the present time—fill up the ranks of the organization.

What he is interested in is not so much training, although that can be done by the organization, as to fill up the ranks of the organization. He says:

> The new man would be an organic part of that unit, and we would be trying to make that an effective unit as quickly as possible.

Again:

> We would make an allotment of men to the National Guard which would carry them up from about 230,000 to just a little short of 400,000; the allotment of men to the Regular Army would carry it up to about 500,000.

On Sunday, August 3, Judge Patterson, the Assistant Secretary of War, announced that we should have under arms 1,300,000 men. If that is the program, then the men who are drafted now will have to be retained in the Army for at least 2 years instead of 1. In short, the bill is not an educational bill, or even a training bill, because you can see that if he gets 400,000 men in October, which would be 900,000, and calls 400,000 more next April, which would be 1,300,000 the men called in October 1941 will not be trained for another complete year and will not be available to replace the call of October 1940 until October 1942, so that each man will have to be kept 2 years in order to build up the Army of 1,300,000, if that is what the program is. In other words, this is a bill to create by selective draft an army of unlimited size, as that size may be later determined by Congress. It is not a compulsory military training bill.

It seems clear to me that we are putting the cart before the horse. Surely Congress should first determine how large an army the emergency requires, and we should then consider the best means of raising that army. As far as any legislation on the part of Congress up to this time is concerned, the country has not been told that we need a Regular Army in excess of 375,000 men, plus the National Guard. Surely no one can be surprised that our Army is no larger than that requested by the administration and authorized by Congress.

5. WE CAN PROVIDE ADEQUATE DEFENSE WITHOUT ABANDONING THE AMERICAN WAY OF LIFE

There are many who urge with the proponents of this bill, that the emergency requires a complete recasting of American life, a dedication of our entire energies to defense alone, and a subordination of every principle on which this Government is based. With that point of view I emphatically disagree. If we have maintained our present Navy at a cost of about $750,000,000 a year, we should be able to maintain a two-ocean Navy for a billion and a half dollars. The cost of maintaining and replacing the enlarged Army and air force should not be over $2,000,000,000 a year.

That would make a grand total for maintenance, after this Army and Navy are built up, of about $3,500,000,000 a year, an increase of $2,000,000,000 over the amount of money we have been spending. That is a heavy burden on the economy of the United States, but it is not enough to force us to change the whole economy. We have a national income in excess of $70,000,000,000. We have been spending about $10,000,000,000 for the Federal Government alone on a peace basis. Surely, with economies in other lines, we can provide the additional funds by increased taxation. It is true that the tax system must be completely revised, but I see no reason why it cannot leave unimpaired the essential features of our economic system. In other words, the burden which we can look forward to is not one which, in my opinion, is a justification for saying that we must abandon every other consideration, we must abandon every principle on which this country is based, and adopt some form of totalitarian defense.

Surely the manpower required need not upset our constitutional liberties. A million men may have to be permanently employed in the Army, Navy, and Marine Corps, and a million and a quarter perhaps trained for the Reserve, out of a total of 42,000,000 between the ages of 18 and 65. That certainly can be done without recasting our whole life. We have something like 9,000,000 men unemployed today. We should not exaggerate the character of the emergency.

Mr. WHEELER. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. TAFT. Certainly.

Mr. WHEELER. I should like to call attention to the fact that the other day we passed a bill here in connection with which the question arose as to whether we would permit the men affected by the bill to be sent out of the United States. Of course, the argument was immediately made that we must do it, and in the Senate the proposal to limit the service of the men to the United States was defeated.

In contrast to the hysteria that is prevalent in the United States with reference to our getting into the war, and the fears that we have on that score, I interrupt the Senator long enough to call his attention to what was done in the Commonwealth of Australia in their defense act. I read from paragraph 49 of the Defense Act of 1903–39, page 15:

> Military forces not liable to serve beyond Commonwealth. Members of the defense force who are members of the military forces shall not be required, unless they voluntarily agree to do so, to serve beyond the limits of the Commonwealth and those of any territory under the authority of the Commonwealth.

That is the law of Australia.

In Canada, when they passed the draft act—and they passed it only after they got into the war—they also provided that—

> The powers conferred by the next preceding section may not be exercised for the purpose of requiring persons to serve in the military, naval, or air forces outside of Canada and the territorial waters thereof.

I also call attention to the fact that New Zealand had a similar provision, saying that the men should not be called outside of the boundaries of New Zealand, while here in the United States we are so afraid we are to be attacked, or that somebody else in this hemisphere is to be attacked, that we provided that our soldiers might be sent anywhere in the world. There is nothing in this conscription bill limiting the service of the men who are called. They may be used anywhere that it is desired to use them in the whole world, but three countries which are Dominions of Great Britain and which are at the present time at war, have provided that their soldiers shall be used only in defense of their own dominions.

I ask unanimous consent to have printed in full in the RECORD the extracts from the statutes of Australia, Canada, and New Zealand to which I have referred.

There being no objection, the matter referred to was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

[The Commonwealth of Australia. The Defense Act, 1903–39,[1] p. 15]

MILITARY FORCES NOT LIABLE TO SERVE BEYOND COMMONWEALTH

49. Members of the defense force who are members of the military forces shall not be required, unless they voluntarily agree to do so, to serve beyond the limits of the Commonwealth and those of any territory under the authority of the Commonwealth.

[As passed by the House of Commons June 20, 1940, 1st sess., 19th Parliament, 4 George VI, 1940. The House of Commons of Canada]

1. This act may be cited as the National Resources Mobilization Act, 1940.

2. Subject to the provisions of section 3 hereof, the Governor in Council may do and authorize such acts and things and make from time to time such orders and regulations requiring persons to place themselves, their services, and their property at the disposal of His Majesty in the right of Canada as may be deemed necessary or expedient for securing the public safety, the defense of Canada, the maintenance of public order, or the efficient prosecution of the war, or for maintaining supplies or services essential to the life of the community.

3. The powers conferred by the next preceding section may not be exercised for the purpose of requiring persons to serve in the military, naval, or air forces outside of Canada and the territorial waters thereof.

CONSCRIPTION LAWS OF NEW ZEALAND AND AUSTRALIA

NEW ZEALAND

The Minister of Defense, F. Jones, announced on September 8, 1939, that it had been decided to raise a special military force for service "within or beyond" New Zealand. Enlistment would be entirely voluntary and would be confined to men between the ages of 21 and 35, who could only join as rankers or noncommissioned officers. Preference would be given to single men not engaged in essential industries, in a special order, beginning with serving members of the territorial forces. The minimum period of training would be 3 months. After that period, if their services were not required immediately, all hands would be granted indefinite leave without pay. They would be allowed to return to their civil occupations, but would be liable to be called up at short notice.

On September 12, 1939, the first day of recruiting for the force, the Minister of Defense stated that the ready response of the young men had been most striking. There also had been a wonderful response to the appeal for recruits for the air force.

On September 22, 1939, in the House of Representatives, the Minister of Defense disclosed that the defense estimates provided for 6 months' training for the first echelon of 6,600 in the special military force, for 4 months' training for the second echelon of 5,000, and for 2 months' for the third echelon, also of 5,000.

On October 13, 1939, regulations were gazetted compelling employers to reinstate employees on the termination of their military service in the war, with payment of increased salaries which they would have received if they had not enlisted. Failure to comply with the regulations renders employers liable to prosecution, together with payment to employees not reinstated of renumeration up to 12 weeks' salaries.[2]

AUSTRALIA

1. National Security Act

This act, which makes provision for the safety and defense of the commonwealth and its territories during the present state of war, was assented to on September 9, 1939.

The main provision (sec. 5) of the act is that which confers on the Governor General power to make emergency regulations. In particular, regulations may be made with respect to the taking possession or control of property or the acquisition of property of alien enemies, the conditions of disposal of property and goods, the prohibition of acts of aliens, the disclosure of information, the prevention of money or goods leaving Australia, and the entry upon or search of premises.

The regulations may provide for empowering such persons as are prescribed to make orders, rules, or bylaws for any purposes for which the regulations may be made.

Nothing in this section shall authorize any form of compulsory naval, military, or air-force service.

The making of any provision for trial by courts martial of persons not subject to naval, military, or air-force law is also prohibited.[3]

2. Compulsory training

In the house of representatives on November 15, 1939, the Prime Minister, Mr. R. G. Menzies, announced that the war cabinet had decided to keep the militia forces at an adequately trained strength of 75,000 men, and for that purpose compulsory military training would be reintroduced in January next. While all parties, he thought, agreed that service abroad must maintain its voluntary character, there was a growing recognition of the fact that military training for the defense of Australia should be a normal part of their civic life, and if it was to be just and democratic, it should be made compulsory. There was no question of conscription for overseas service. They were definitely pledged against it. In order to maintain the militia forces at their appropriate strength, it was not necessary to go beyond calling up the trainees of one age class. The class selected consisted of those who attained the age of 21 years during the current year. As time went on, and each year another group of men entered this class, the obligation to train would attach to it, so that in the course of a few years the men of 21, 22, and 23 years, and so on, would have received a substantial measure of military training[4] (Andre Bernard, August 12, 1940).

Mr. TAFT. I think the facts stated by the Senator from Montana very clearly show that the countries named by him have not the exaggerated idea of the importance of manpower in war which seems to underlie the whole theory of this bill.

We should not exaggerate the character of the emergency. In working out an adequate defense, I am convinced it can be worked out under a democratic form of government. The reason why I am opposed to this bill is that I propose to try to keep our Government from becoming a totalitarian government, in spite of the conditions which exist, unless we get to a point, as we do in war, in which, in effect, it is necessary to set up a totalitarian government.

Mr. PEPPER. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. TAFT. Certainly.

Mr. PEPPER. I have always been interested in the distinction between a government which confers executive power upon the executive, but continually holds the strings of that power in a legislative body, where it may be rescinded or altered at the will and pleasure of the legislative body, and a government such as I have construed the German Government to be, in which the legislative power has been completely abolished, in which it ceases to exist, in which the executive is the sole power, answerable to nobody. Does the Senator from Ohio see any distinction in those two situations?

Mr. TAFT. It seems to me perfectly clear that all of these executive powers began when the legislative body conferred on the Executive more and more power, until the Executive had complete discretionary power to take all property and to take all men, just exactly like that bill recently introduced in the Senate, giving the President complete power to confiscate everything. Once that power is conferred on the Executive, while the legislature theoretically has a right to recall it, the conditions which the legislature has created are such that the legislature is never able to recall the power. That has been the history of the establishment of each of these totalitarian states, and that has been the history of practically every tyranny in the history of the world.

Mr. PEPPER. I will ask the Senator whether or not the destruction of that power has not been preceded by the destruction of the things which we regard as constitutional guaranties in this country. For example, has there not been a secret police system which prevented free assemblage and any expression of sentiment on the part of the people, prevented the enjoyment of freedom of speech, prevented a free press, prevented free political parties and free discussion, and set up a military power which was responsible only to the Executive, which actually, by force and coercion, restrained the people from the exercise of democratic privileges? Have not those things always preceded the abdication of the legislative power?

Mr. TAFT. I do not claim to be completely conversant with history, but I am sure they were all incidents of the establishment of arbitrary executive power and not its cause, if the Senator wants an answer.

Mr. PEPPER. Just one other question. Does the Senator think that, so long as the privilege of a free Australian ballot, which may be cast by the citizen in secrecy, lives in this country; so long as there is not intimidation and coercion at the ballot box of the people of the country; so long as a free press and free speech and the right of free and open assemblage exist; so long as Congress is elected by the people, the Members of the House of Representatives and one-third of the Senate every 2 years; so long as the Congress retains its constitutional power, and can revoke, alter, or rescind any powers it confers upon anybody else, does the Senator think there is any likelihood of anything that can fairly be called dictatorship in the United States?

Mr. TAFT. Yes, I do. I think that if Congress confers all of its powers, or confers such wide executive powers on the President that he can do what he pleases; if it practically abandons the right of appropriation, which is the purpose of the spend-lend programs we have had presented to us; if we confer upon the President indefinite discretion—I say we no longer have a democracy, not an American democracy, no matter what other rights may be retained.

Mr. WHEELER. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. TAFT. Certainly.

Mr. WHEELER. I call attention to the fact that in Germany the people are supposed to have the right to vote, and they do vote, but when I was in Germany 3 or 4 years ago I said to some laborers, "Do you not have the right to vote?" They said, "Yes." I said, "Can you not vote secretly?" They said, "Yes; but we are afraid to, because we will be sent off to concentration camps." That was the result of the fact that they had granted so much power to the dictator.

Even in Russia the Communists claim that they have a legislative body, and they call themselves a democracy; they claim that they have a democratic form of government. But in every one of these countries where there is a dictatorship it is not claimed that it is a dictatorship, the rulers claim they are acting because the people grant them the power.

Once power is granted to a dictator, under whatever name, I have never heard, and no one else has ever heard, of the power being given up by the executive branch of the government.

Mr. TAFT. That government might be denominated a democracy which every 4 years elected a man who had absolute power to run everything as he chose. That is literally a democracy, because it is the rule of the people. They have elected that man. He is their representative. The difficulty is that at the end of the 4 years they do not get the same chance to elect again, whatever power they have in theory. That power is abolished in fact. It is submerged in a condition of actual power conferred upon the executive.

Mr. PEPPER. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. TAFT. Certainly.

Mr. PEPPER. Does not the Senator recall the period of the World War days, when Congress conferred upon the President of the United States very great powers during the period of the emergency, and then, when the emergency passed, the powers were revoked or rescinded or altered without this country ceasing to be a democracy?

Mr. TAFT. War is such an emergency that, as a practical matter, the President is nearly always made a dictator in wartimes. But if we begin to do that every time Congress thinks there is an emergency, which is the theory we have pursued for some years, it takes very little, after a while, to make an emergency. In other words, it is urged now that in time of peace we shall confer the power of conscripting men by force, of dragging them from their homes and putting them into the Army. That is a very different thing, to my mind, from doing the same thing in wartimes. In wartimes a democracy temporarily creates a dictatorship. But it is recognized that when the war is over the dictatorship will end, although there always may be danger that at the end of the war it may not end. It has ended with us after every war.

Mr. PEPPER. That is attributable to the fact that the Congress makes a finding that an emergency exists, is it not? Congress regards the condition as an emergency, and therefore confers emergency powers on the Executive and certain other people. If Congress determines the existence of the emergency, may it not likewise determine when the emergency ceases to exist? Is not the Senator therefore addressing himself, not to what might be done under the emergency, but is he not rather trying to persuade the Congress not to adopt an emergency measure at this time?

Mr. TAFT. I say that if Congress can declare an emergency like this in time of peace, now, it can declare it in time of peace after the war. There is no way to draw the line. No one can see the distinction. War is war, and when war is over there is peace, and everyone knows that is the time when the emergency power should end.

Mr. PEPPER. The thing which rather struck me as incongruous in the Senator's argument was that he is appealing to a body which has great power—that is, the Congress of the people of the United States. When an emergency faces that Congress, it has authority to do certain things to protect the country. Because in an emergency which the Congress may find to exist it may exercise extraordinary power or confer the right to exercise extraordinary power upon somebody else, the Senator uses that possibility as an argument that today that constitutes dictatorship. Yet he professes to be directing his argument to a democratic assembly, which may adopt or decline to adopt a measure that is proposed.

Mr. TAFT. In the first place, I have not said anything about a dictatorship. The argument I was advancing was that in time of peace we should carefully guard our system, and not adopt anything which would transgress our ideas of American democracy, unless it became absolutely necessary. I have not said that this would create a dictatorship necessarily. I say that any move in this direction tends to create a dictatorship, and we should avoid it, unless it is absolutely in our opinion essential to the welfare of the country. If I were convinced of the existence of the emergency, I might be willing to vote for a draft in peacetime. I have not said I would not.

Mr. PEPPER. It may not be wise, it may not be desirable, to pass the proposed legislation, but if it is passed by the Congress, which is elected by the people of the United States and is answerable only to the people of the United States, I cannot see anything that is contrary to the principles of democratic government about it. Any legislation we pass may be wise or it may be unwise, but if we pass it, acting with the right of discussion preserved, and in the exercise of our democratic prerogatives, I cannot see that anyone has the right to say that it is an undemocratic thing to do.

Mr. TAFT. I would say that if today we passed a law—and there is such a measure pending here—giving the President power to confiscate the property of any individual in the United States if he thought it necessary for the national defense, and draft anyone he chose, if we gave him complete power over the entire life of the United States, it might be our judgment that that was the thing to do; but it would not be democracy, in my opinion.

Mr. PEPPER. But it would be the exercise of the principles of democracy in a free government by the people's representatives.

Mr. TAFT. The law would be perfectly legal, I am not saying it would not be legal. I am merely saying that after we got through we would not have a democracy.

Mr. PEPPER. But if the Congress repealed the law when they changed their opinion about it, would we not still have a democracy?

Mr. OVERTON. Mr. President, will the Senator from Ohio yield?

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. LEE in the chair). Does the Senator from Ohio yield to the Senator from Louisiana?

Mr. TAFT. Certainly.

Mr. OVERTON. Does the able Senator from Ohio take the position that the enactment of the pending bill would be a step toward dictatorship?

Mr. TAFT. It certainly would be. I do not say it is dictatorship. I am saying it is a step toward dictatorship.

Mr. OVERTON. When the Congress of the United States calls young men into service for the purpose of giving them military training for a period of 12 months, and these young men then go back to their regular occupations and pursuits and become citizens of the United States engaged in ordinary pursuits and vocations, there is not the slightest semblance of our undertaking to establish a dictatorship. We are merely giving military training to a certain number of our citizens in order that we may be prepared in the event we should unfortunately be drawn into war. I think there is quite a distinction between having a Regular Establishment of an army of great proportions and calling our young men into training and then letting them return to their usual pursuits and vocations. We are not maintaining a huge Regular Establishment. The Regular Army is authorized at a strength of 375,000 men. We are merely training men to be used as a reserve body on which to draw in case of danger.

Mr. TAFT. Perhaps the Senator was not here earlier during my discussion, but I spent some time attempting to point out that this is not a training bill; that under a real compulsory training bill we would take the boys as they came out of high school, before they started on their life work, and train as many as we chose. Under this bill we would take men out of their life's work, 80 percent of them already engaged in the occupations in which they wish to succeed, and we would take a year out of their lives. That time cannot be put back. There are many businesses in which a man may get ahead by convincing his employer that he is a man to be trusted and relied on. He gets a position in which he can go on to success. He is taken out of that for a year. Who takes his place? Somebody else, of course. The employer has to have somebody to do the work. When the young man comes back he may find a job somewhere, but his life is interrupted, and his life may well be ruined. That is particularly true of a young lawyer, for example, who has practiced, let us say, only for 4 years, who has just started to build up a practice, and who is grabbed and taken away from his work for a year. When he comes back he may find that his practice is gone and that he must begin his life over again.

I pointed out also that General Marshall clearly stated that this is no training bill. What he wants is 900,000 men under arms next spring. I pointed out what the Assistant Secretary of War said. He wants 1,300,000 men under arms.

The bill provides for a draft to fill up the Army. It provides for training, yes; but training is incidental to the theory that we must use this draft to build up an army to the number of men that the Army thinks is necessary to meet whatever the emergency may be.

Mr. OVERTON. Mr. President, will the Senator again yield?

Mr. TAFT. I yield.

Mr. OVERTON. I think the Senator from Ohio is perfectly right in taking the position that the bill works a greater hardship than a bill, for instance, which would carry into execution a program of military service by which young men of a certain age, before they enter into business, are called into training for a period of a year. But the situation that confronts us now is one where there is a necessity to have a reserve force of trained men.

I am not one of those who expect that Hitler will be over here tomorrow, or next week, or possibly next year, or perhaps in the next 3 or 4 years, or at any particular time, but I do know that military strength is a relative term. A decade ago the military strength we had, in our Navy, in our Regular Establishment, and in our National Guard, may have been sufficient to cope with any situation that might arise, or that could reasonably be expected to arise. But today we observe certain governments creating tremendous war machines. We find that Germany has a tremendous war machine, equipped with not only trained men, but seasoned troops. We find the same situation in Italy. We find the same situation in Japan. In order that we may maintain our relative military strength as a great world power, it is necessary for us to do a certain amount of training, and to have a Reserve Corps upon which we can draw in the event that it becomes necessary for us to go to war.

Mr. TAFT. Mr. President, I do not object at all to training. I intend to consider later at some length the number of men we should have, and to show, I think very clearly, that we can get them by a voluntary system. I have introduced a bill authorizing the President to set up military training camps on a voluntary basis, and I am convinced, so far as the emergency before us today is concerned, that it can be handled on a voluntary basis, but I would rather give the details and reasons for that argument later in my remarks, so they may come in order.

Mr. OVERTON. Mr. President, will the Senator yield again?

Mr. TAFT. Surely.

Mr. OVERTON. My objection to the voluntary system is that it imposes a penalty on patriotism and affords a premium to slackerism.

Mr. TAFT. I think I shall answer that later on.

Mr. OVERTON. I thank the Senator from Ohio.

Mr. TAFT. Mr. President, I was pointing out when I was interrupted that in my opinion in an emergency of this kind it is peculiarly essential that we retain our respect for the principles of constitutional government, and that we go no further in modifying them than is absolutely essential.

We should not exaggerate the character of the emergency. In working out an adequate defense, I am convinced it can be worked out under a democratic form of government, if we try, if we pay some attention to that principle. I am convinced it can be worked out under an economic system in which initiative and free enterprise still provide the energy and force which has made this country the powerful Nation which we are, if we try, and pay some attention to keeping that system in force.

I am convinced that it can be worked out, retaining the principles of individual liberty for which it was founded, if we try. In short, I am convinced that to meet the threat of a totalitarian nation we need not make ourselves totalitarian. I shudder when I hear the words "total defense." I do not know what "total defense" means, unless it means the subjugation of every other principle of our life to the one subject—military defense.

If the words mean anything, they mean that the energies of every individual shall be devoted to defense and that we shall wipe out from our minds every other goal. That is not true today; I hope it may never be true. At a time like this it is peculiarly necessary that with every measure we take we see that the principles of American freedom are guarded well. Never has the American way of life been in such danger—danger as much from within as from without.

It is said that there is no difference in principle between those who say, "We are willing to have a draft if necessary" and those who say, "We want to have a draft anyway." I think that is a difference of principle. I think the whole question here is whether there is the necessity for changing one of the basic principles of American democracy by imposing a selective draft in time of peace, and that, in my opinion, is a basic question of principle.

6. A PEACETIME DRAFT IS CONTRARY TO LIBERTY AND AMERICAN PRECEDENT

We should avoid a draft if it can possibly be done. The distinguished chairman of the Military Affairs Committee spoke of its tragic necessity. In war it may be necessary, but I agree with him that it is tragic to permit the Government to take a man already well established in his life work, and compel him to give up that work in time of peace and enter the Army. That is certainly not liberty or freedom, whether it is democracy or not. The basis of our Government has been the right of individuals to choose their own way of life, to find the niche they fit, to rise to positions of interest and power no matter how humble their beginnings may be. Probably no quality is so essential to success as persistence and thoroughness. To take a man when he has gotten well started, and compel him to be absent for a year, undoes the progress he has made in his chosen occupation, and is more than likely to affect his whole life unfavorably.

It is said that a compulsory draft is a democratic system. I deny that it has anything to do with democracy. It is neither democratic nor undemocratic. It is far more typical of totalitarian nations than of democratic nations. The theory behind it leads directly to totalitarianism. It is absolutely opposed to the principles of individual liberty which have always been considered a part of American democracy. To choose 1 man in 10 by lot, and require him to leave his home against his will, is more like roulette than it is like democracy. Many people came to this country for the single purpose of avoiding the requirements of military service in Europe. This country has always been opposed to a large standing army, and it has been opposed to the use of the draft except in time of war when it may be absolutely necessary. I shrink from the very setting up of thousands of draft boards, with clerks and employees, and endless paper work and red tape; from the registration of 12,000,000 men and the prying into every feature of their lives, their physical condition, their religious convictions, their financial status, and even their hobbies.

Mr. President, I hold in my hand the selective-service questionnaire for registrants under this bill, or at least its salient sections, apparently prepared by the Army, and published in the New York Herald Tribune of Friday, July 26, 1940. It covers an entire page of the New York Herald Tribune. It asks a man every question that anyone can think of that might possibly be of some interest to some friend of that particular man.

I ask unanimous consent that it be printed in the RECORD at this point as part of my remarks.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

The matter referred to is as follows:

[From the New York Herald Tribune of July 26, 1940]

Here follow forms for two supporting affidavits, to be sworn to by relatives or business associates in support of the registrant's claims under series IX or X.

Series XI requires the registrant in five questions to tell what country he is a citizen of, whether he intends to become an American citizen, whether his parents are citizens and whether he is a registered voter. Every registrant must answer Question No. 1, which is, "To what country do you owe allegiance?"

Series XII requires the court record, if any, of the individual—whether ever convicted of a crime, whether in jail or at large on bail, probation, or parole. It is confidential.

Series XIII asks only whether the individual requires deferred classification, and, if so, on what grounds and for what length of time.

Next follows a form of sworn "Registrant's Affidavit," to the effect that the answers to all the foregoing questions are true. If the registrant has received assistance from an adviser, the adviser will sign an acknowledgement.

At the end of the questionnaire are spaces for "Minute of Action on Request for Extension of Time for Filing Claim or Proof," "Minute of Action by Local Board" on classifying the registrant, "Appeal to Board of Appeal" if the registrant disputes his classification, "Minute of Action by Board of Appeal" in classifying the registrant on appeal and a space for appeal to the President of the United States over a ruling by a board of appeal.

Mr. TAFT. The draft is said to be democratic because it hits the rich as well as the poor. Since the rich are about 2 percent of the total, it is still true that 98 percent of those drafted are going to be the boys without means. In fact, it is probable that under the volunteer system you would get a greater percentage of wealthy boys than under the draft. These boys all go to college, and the percentage of enlistment from the colleges has always been higher, because the need for the defense of this country against countries thousands of miles distant is brought home to those in the colleges more forcibly than it is to the boy who is employed locally, and to whom international affairs are a great many thousand miles away.

The principle of a compulsory draft is basically wrong. If we must use compulsion to get an army, why not use compulsion to get men for other essential tasks? We must have men to manufacture munitions, implements of war, war vessels, and other equipment. Why not draft labor for these occupations at wages lower than the standard? There are many other industries absolutely essential to defense, like the utility industries, the railroads, the coal-mining industry. Why not draft men for those industries also at $21 a month? Protection is absolutely essential against domestic violence. If we draft soldiers, why not draft policemen and firemen for city and State service? The maintenance of an army on inadequate pay is merely a matter of precedent with no justification under our form of government. To a certain extent the draft act recognizes that the Government may compel men to remain in war industries, for they are exempted for that purpose, but told that if they leave that industry they must at once become subject to draft. The logical conclusion of this peacetime conscription bill is that we should draft all labor and assign all men to the jobs we think they ought to have.

Mr. WHEELER. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. TAFT. I yield.

Mr. WHEELER. My attention has been called to a speech which was made last night over the radio by Fulton Lewis, in which he quoted the Senator from Florida [Mr. PEPPER]. I have sent word to the Senator from Florida, who is not now in the Chamber, suggesting that I think it would be proper for him to be present at this time. I read from the radio address:

> He said Congress should outline certain general, broad objectives. It should tell the President, he said, "We want an army that's capable of defending the United States," and from there on, it should be up to the President to decide how large that army should be—how the men should be selected. His job would be to just get it.
> Senator PEPPER said the President should have, in his opinion, authority to take over all private industry and all private enterprise and all private endeavor—or any part of it—any of it that has any connection with national defense. I asked whether, as a matter of practical fact, that wouldn't include almost everything in the country—almost all business and industry—and Senator PEPPER conceded quite frankly, "Yes, it would."
> Senator PEPPER said he sees no reason why—if Mr. Wm. S. Knudsen and Mr. Ed Stettinius are willing to come to Washington, to direct the national-defense commission and give their services at a dollar a year—why some other industrial leader should be drawing $2,000,000 a year in salary or profits.
> And he said, with particular emphasis, that he sees no reason why Mr. Henry Ford should be allowed to produce what Mr. Henry Ford "wants to produce."
> I asked him about conscription of labor—whether the President should have the power to draft whatever men he wants, not only for the military service of the Army, but also for work—and Senator Pepper said he believes the President should have that power. He said there is no reason why soldiers should draw $21 a month, while the worker in some factory is drawing $20 a day.
> I asked whether that means that the President would have the power to tell all of the workers—all of the employees in factories and plants all over the country—that they shall go to work in this place, at such and such a wage, or over here at some other wage, regardless of what they were getting as private employees, and he said, "Yes; he believes the President should have the power to do that."
> Now, that seemed to clear up all possible questions of policy and point of view—at least, all I could think of—but in view of the broader angles of the whole picture—the fact that Senator PEPPER, after all, is a recognized member of the very inner circle of the New Deal—it seemed to be important to find out for you whether these were the views of that very inner circle, officially, or Senator PEPPER's own individual views * * * so I asked the Senator whether these are ideas in which he stands alone. I reminded him of the fact that he is what he is, in the New Deal family, and asked whether there are other New Deal Senators and other leaders in the administrative branch of the Government who share those views with him. And Senator PEPPER said, with a moment of hesitation, that a great many of those gentlemen subscribe to these same theories; in fact, he made a flat prediction, he said, "The whole thing is going to come."

Mr. PEPPER entered the Chamber.

Mr. WHEELER. Mr. President, I was calling attention to the statement which was made over the radio by Fulton Lewis, concerning an interview with the Senator from Florida. I have just read that portion on pages 4 and 5, in which it is said:

> Senator PEPPER said the President should have, in his opinion, authority to take over all private industry and all private enterprise and all private endeavor—or any part of it—any of it that has any connection with national defense. I asked whether, as a matter of practical fact, that wouldn't include almost everything in the country—almost all business and industry—and Senator PEPPER conceded quite frankly, "Yes; it would."
> Senator PEPPER said he sees no reason why, if Mr. Wm. S. Knudsen and Mr. Ed Stettinius are willing to come to Washington to direct the National Defense Commission and give their services at a dollar a year, why some other industrial leader should be drawing $2,000,000 a year in salary or profits.
> And he said, with particular emphasis, that he sees no reason why Mr. Henry Ford should be allowed to produce what Mr. Henry Ford "wants to produce."
> I asked him about conscription of labor, whether the President should have the power to draft whatever men he wants, not only for the military service of the Army, but also for work, and Senator PEPPER said he believes the President should have that power. He said there is no reason why soldiers should draw $21 a month while the worker in some factory is drawing $20 a day.
> I asked whether that means that the President would have the power to tell all of the workers—all of the employees in factories and plants all over the country—that they shall go to work in this place at such and such a wage, or over here at some other wage, regardless of what they were getting as private employees; and he said, "Yes; he believes the President should have the power to do that."
> Now, that seemed to clear up all possible questions of policy and point of view—at least all I could think of—but in view of the broader angles of the whole picture—the fact that Senator PEPPER, after all, is a recognized member of the very inner circle of the New Deal—it seemed to be important to find out for you whether these were the views of that very inner circle, officially, or Senator PEPPER's own individual views; so I asked the Senator whether these are ideas in which he stands alone. I reminded him of the fact that he is what he is, in the New Deal family, and asked whether there are other New Deal Senators and other leaders in the administrative branch of the Government who share those views with him. And Senator PEPPER said, with a moment of hesitation, that a great many of those gentlemen subscribe to these same theories; in fact, he made a flat prediction—he said, "the whole thing is going to come."

Mr. PEPPER. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. TAFT. I yield to the Senator from Florida.

Mr. PEPPER. I was downstairs and about to have my lunch when word came to me that the able Senator from Montana was making some remarks about the broadcast which was made last night by Fulton Lewis.

Mr. WHEELER. I sent word to the Senator.

Mr. PEPPER. I appreciate that. The first knowledge I had that the broadcast had been delivered was when it was called to my attention by a friend this morning as having been reported in the Times-Herald. I obtained a copy of the Times-Herald and read some of the story; but before taking any further action with reference to it I thought it better to send for the script which was used by the radio broadcaster, who happens to be a very fine gentleman and one of my good friends. Just a few moments ago, before going downstairs, I received a copy of the script from Mr. Lewis, who was kind enough to send it to me.

At a little later time—and certainly not within the time of the able Senator from Ohio—I shall discuss the matter. I do not think it would be fair to the Senator from Ohio to do so in his time. In fact, I am not at all sure that it is proper for either the able Senator from Montana or myself to interrupt the speech of the Senator from Ohio to read from a radio broadcast made last night by Fulton Lewis. I do not know why the able Senator from Montana chose to interrupt the address of the Senator from Ohio and read the radio broadcast at this time. At least that is a little broader than the usual interruption.

Mr. TAFT. Mr. President, I might explain that I was making the point that the logical conclusion of peacetime conscription was the conscription of everything—property, men, industries, and all labor.

Mr. PEPPER. A little later during the day I shall discuss the matter. I did not contemplate doing so, because I have not made it a practice in my life to go around denying what other people say about me. If I were in the habit of doing so, I dare say that I should spend most of my time at it, and perhaps most of the rest of us in public life would devote a considerable part of our time to that object if we should deny everything anybody says about us, or everything which appears in the newspaper about what we think or believe. Inasmuch as the matter has been brought up, a little later in the day I shall ask the privilege of making some comments on the broadcast and stating what part of it is true and what part of it is not true or accurate.

I digress only to ask the able Senator from Montana whether or not it is true that he and I and the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. WALSH] ever had any such discussion as is referred to in the broadcast?

Mr. WHEELER. I do not remember it. The only thing I remember is that in Chicago we were discussing some matter, and I said to the Senator from Florida, "What you are seeking to do is to set up a dictatorship." The Senator's reply was "Only temporarily."

Mr. PEPPER. My statement is that no such conversation occurred.

Mr. WHEELER. I do not wish to argue with the Senator. I know that it took place.

Mr. TAFT. Mr. President, I think perhaps the argument might be resumed later.

The point I was making is that the logical conclusion of peacetime conscription is that we should draft all labor and assign all men to the jobs we think they ought to have. Apparently that is the logical conclusion reached by the Senator from Florida. Certainly it is the conclusion reached by one of the strong advocates of conscription, Mr. Walter Lippmann. He says this of the Burke-Wadsworth bill:

> The foundation of the system is the registration of all adult males and their classification according to their training. All registered males are then legally liable to national service, they may be selected to work or to fight, depending upon their abilities and the national need. Under such a system it is not only possible to recruit in an orderly way the relatively small number who can usefully be trained and equipped, it is possible to call all the others as they are needed to jobs when they are needed, or to be trained for technical tasks which will be multiplied greatly if we really mean to build the new Navy, the new air force, and the new Army. If, therefore, the conscription bill is to serve its real purpose, it must not be regarded as a mere device for putting 1 man out of 25 into uniform. It must be regarded as a method of mobilizing the men of the country for the much larger and more complicated task of industrial preparedness.

That is Mr. Lippmann's analysis of the original Burke-Wadsworth bill. The substance and purposes of the two bills are not different, for the naval or military service of the United States in time of war may easily be extended to any important industry.

In short, the logic behind the bill requires a complete regimentation of most labor, and the assignment of jobs to every man able to work. This is actually done today in the Communist and Fascist states, which we are now apparently seeking to emulate.

Many organizations ordinarily conservative have gone on record in favor of the conscription of property in time of war if men are conscripted. They were joined last week by Mrs. Franklin D. Roosevelt. I do not agree that the arguments for one are the same as the arguments for the other, but if men are to be conscripted in peacetime, there certainly seems no reason why the Government should not arbitrarily direct the method in which all property shall be used in formulating a general-defense program. If men are selected by lot to serve at $21 a month, it may be argued that manufacturers should be selected by lot, and those selected be required to produce munitions at a loss, at least to the extent that such loss only impairs their surplus and does not result in bankruptcy. Certainly taxes should be immediately raised so that property will at least contribute the entire cost of the present program instead of having the Government borrow the money from the banks and pay it off later out of taxes on property and consumers alike.

The argument in favor of conscription proves too much. If the emergency is as great as alleged, then we should adopt a completely socialized state and place ourselves and our property at the disposal of the Government. This is fascism. It could only be justified if it were the only possible alternative to the subjugation of the United States by fascism from without.

7. NATURE OF THE PERMANENT EMERGENCY

Mr. President, I do not question the fact that we face an emergency situation. I have voted for the various appropriations increasing the size of the Navy and of the Army. But surely it is the duty of Congress to consider as respects each measure brought before it the character and extent of the emergency. We must fully consider whether it requires the tremendous expense involved in each bill. Because we favor a two-ocean navy, we may not necessarily find justification for an army of 1,300,000 men or the conscription of men in time of peace.

In my opinion, the emergency we face today is not so immediate as others believe, but it is serious; and whether England is defeated or not it will be substantially the same for the next 10 years. I will discuss later the problem of the immediate emergency which is said to justify this bill, but at the present time I want to analyze the character of the new world condition to which we must adjust ourselves. For purposes of convenience, we may call it the permanent emergency. I believe that the same condition will exist even if the German attack on England fails. England can hardly hope to overwhelm Germany for years to come. There will always be the possibility of the destruction of the British fleet as there is today and of the breaking up of the British Empire. We must provide for that possibility.

The development of the totalitarian nations, their effective war machines, and their complete lack of regard for international morals have created this new condition. We cannot rely on the sanctity of any treaty or any promise which may be made by the German Government and perhaps by other governments. Force has superseded international law. There is at least a temporary alinement of Germany, Italy, and Japan. I do not think that any of these nations will attack the United States, and I believe that even if they do our present forces can defend us against an attack across 3,000 miles of water. It is frequently said that we have relied on the British fleet to defend us. But it is not true. We have assumed that the British would not attack us or join in any attack. We have always provided a fleet sufficient to defend us against all other nations without British assistance. It is three times as large today as the German Navy, and the Italian Navy is built specially for use in the Mediterranean and in large part said not to be suited to use on the Atlantic Ocean. To attack successfully across an ocean it is said that the attacking force should be at least twice the size of the defenders. But we cannot take a chance as England and France took chances.

8. HOW LARGE AN ARMY DO WE NEED TO MEET NEW WORLD CONDITIONS?

In my opinion, we must have an armed force sufficiently large to repel any attack which might be made. If the possible attackers in the future build up the instruments of war which might be used against us, we must build faster.

I have tried to study the opinions of experts, and I am inclined to agree that we should have a navy in the Atlantic sufficient to repel any European attack, while we have a navy in the Pacific sufficient to repel any attack from Japan. I believe our present Navy can be moved back and forth with sufficient mobility so that no successful attack can be made on either ocean, but I see no reason to take a chance. If we are going to enforce the Monroe Doctrine, so far as it concerns Brazil and Argentina, we will certainly have to have a navy of the size now to be authorized. My chief doubt arises from the fact that the value of battleships is still in some doubt, and our fleet may be obsolete before it is completed. But we can start to build and stop if new developments require a change of plan.

Obviously, today the greatest defensive weapon outside the Navy, and perhaps as important as the Navy, is the air force. I have voted for every airplane appropriation proposed. We wish to defend ourselves not only against a possible landing force but also against any possible raid on our cities. And I may again say that, so far as getting men for the air force is concerned, there does not seem to be the slightest difficulty in getting more to volunteer than can be used.

When it comes to a tremendous standing Army, however, I have the most serious doubts. Apparently I am not alone, for the estimates of the administration itself have been constantly conflicting and constantly changing. I have referred to the estimate of the distinguished chairman of the Military Affairs Committee of from 600,000 to 700,000 men under arms as being necessary. I have referred to General Marshall's apparent desire for 900,000 men, and to Judge Patterson's demand for a million three hundred thousand men.

Judge Patterson's speech is of interest; it has been put into the RECORD. It was made a week ago Sunday. He is Assistant Secretary of War, and he said in so many words in his broadcast:

> Today America needs an Army of about 1,300,000 men. That sounds like a great many soldiers, but it is only 1 for every 100 of population.

Then he goes on to explain what he wants. He wants a ground army of 850,000, 150,000 for the air force, another 150,000 for garrisons, and other men for general headquarters and incidental service. So we have an official estimate, apparently, of 1,300,000.

The President, in January, requested funds for an army of only 227,000 men, and in January there was the possibility, as there is today, that Germany would win the war, a possibility for which we should necessarily have provided. The President must have had that in mind when he recommended an army of 227,000 men. He said in his opening address to the Congress in January this year that he was not seeking increases "as great as enthusiastic alarmists seek." So he also has recognized what I say, that there are enthusiastic alarmists in the United States who ask for more troops than are really necessary.

In his message of May 18, and the estimates accompanying it, the President asked for an army of only 255,000 men. On May 18 the Germans had already conquered Holland and Belgium, and were breaking through the Maginot Line. So the condition then was not very different from that which exists today, and the President, in his message on defense, recommended an army of only 250,000 men. Congress "went him one better," and the military appropriation bill of this year authorized an army of 280,000 men. The message of May 31, which was the second one, requesting another $1,200,000,000, did not request any additional Army personnel. Congress had provided 280,000. That was after the Germans had broken through in France and when France was on the point of defeat. Nevertheless, Congress, without budget authority, increased the Army, at General Marshall's request, to 375,000 men, and provided funds for that purpose.

General Marshall, himself, testified before the House committee on June 4—and that was after the battle of Flanders was over, and the Germans were pushing south in France—that that increase would "enable us to avoid, we hope, the necessity of mobilizing the National Guard." On June 9, before the Senate committee, he testified that a limit of 400,000 on the Regular Army would give "a reasonable liberty of action up to January."

Since those estimates have been made the Senate has authorized calling out the National Guard and Reserves, adding 260,000 effectives to the Army of the United States; and now, on August 3, the Assistant Secretary of War "raises the ante" to 1,300,000 men. This constant increase in the estimates without any substantial change in conditions abroad throws doubt on the validity of all the figures.

I am anxious for an adequate army, just as much as are any of the advocates of this bill, but we do not want to use millions of men and billions of dollars if they are not necessary for defense. Surely we cannot accept every guess that is made by any member of the Government; surely we, ourselves, have the right to inquire how large the standing Army should be.

For exactly what purpose is the great army? Apparently, everybody agrees, that we need about 150,000 men for garrisons in possessions of the United States and coast-defense positions. We may need a small expeditionary force. Certainly we do not intend to send an army to Europe, nor do we intend to send an army to Argentina, Brazil, or Chile. Conceivably we might have to seize islands in the West Indies, or elsewhere, so as to prevent the establishment of air bases at points close to the United States or the Panama Canal.

So far as I know, an expeditionary force of 150,000 men would be as big as we could send to any of those points, with the facilities we have to transport them, and the equipment that is necessary for that kind of a trip.

Finally, the advocates of this measure seem to envisage an attack in force on the United States itself. I do not believe they have realistically considered the difficulty of transporting an armed force across the Atlantic or Pacific Oceans, and its landing on a hostile shore. It would take a tremendous armada to transport 50,000 men. Merely to maintain an army of 100,000 men on our shores would take 1,300,000 tons of shipping in constant use. While our Navy was in existence the task would be impossible.

It is said that our Navy is in the Pacific; but naval strategy, in the event of an attack by Germany, would require that it be sent at once to the Atlantic. It is said that this would leave the Pacific coast without defense against the Japanese. A Japanese expeditionary force to the United States seems to me on its face out of the question. The Japanese are fully occupied in China; but 200,000 men stationed on the Pacific coast, while the Atlantic is defended by the fleet, would certainly make a Japanese force landing impossible. The Japanese would always run the risk that our fleet might slip back into the Pacific and destroy their entire force.

Hanson Baldwin, who is referred to here as a naval expert, estimated the necessary Army at 400,000. I cannot myself see any necessity for a total mobile army, outside of garrisons, of more than 600,000 men, which makes 750,000 with the garrisons. I do not see what we would do with an Army of 1,300,000 men.

Of course, the number required undoubtedly depends on what the Army is to be used for. After the speech which the distinguished chairman of the Military Affairs Committee made during the consideration of the Adams amendment to limit the use of the National Guard troops to the United States and its possessions, it seems to me that the administration must have in mind the possibility of using our Army to defend Brazil, Argentina, and Chile. Of course, if they do have that in mind, it is easy to explain Judge Patterson's figures, for if we are to send an army farther away from the United States than is Europe itself, it would certainly have to be a substantial Army, well able to defend itself among a foreign people. It seems to me utterly impossible to think that we could undertake the defense of Brazil or Argentina with our Army. The Monroe Doctrine must be enforced by the Navy, and if it cannot be enforced by the Navy it cannot be enforced at all.

I was considerably relieved by the President's statement last week that the chances against the National Guard being used outside of the United States or its possessions were 100 to 1. Apparently, the President does not see the emergency which the distinguished chairman of the Military Affairs Committee is imagining. He must be discounting the possibility that Germany will attempt a seizure of any islands or air bases within reach of the United States, and since such a possibility is certainly greater than the possibility of an expeditionary force attacking the United States itself he must be discounting the possibility of any such expeditionary force.

My own conclusion is that the presence of 750,000 men under arms in the United States, 100,000 in excess of the present legally authorized force, supplies an ample margin for the defense of the United States during the next 2 or 3 years. Of course it is possible that Germany may develop other weapons. Airplanes may acquire a longer range and a greater carrying capacity. On the other hand, when we have once built a 2-ocean navy, we may be able to reduce the number of men in the Army.

What reserves are necessary? The day of large armies seems to be waning. We must remember that conscription, universal military service, was in force in Belgium, in Holland, in France, and it did not do them any good. Huge reserves of men, as suggested by Colonel Adler, are probably less necessary today than they have been in the past. The Germans have developed a new technique in warfare, in connection with which the requirement is for a highly professional force acting with perfect harmony and timing. I do not know how large an army the British have today, but the size of their army is an unimportant factor in the question as to whether or not they can successfully defend England against German attack. Just as large reserves of men are not necessary for a navy, so mere quantity of manpower has somewhat less importance today in a mechanized army. The idea of a reserve of four or five million men, suggested last week by the distinguished chairman of the Military Affairs Committee, seems wholly unnecessary. There would be no equipment, and inadequate training. The Army is apparently aiming to provide equipment for a possible total force of 2,000,000 men, which would provide a reserve of from 700,000 to 1,250,000, according to the number of men under arms. Such a number of carefully and completely trained reserves seems to be reasonable.

The permanent emergency does not demand more than a 2-ocean navy, the air force already provided for, an army of 750,000 under arms, and 1,250,000 reserves. Is a draft necessary to provide that many men?

9. CAN THE MEN BE OBTAINED WITHOUT CONSCRIPTION?

Can we permanently maintain our naval forces at their increased strength, and an army of 750,000 men, with 1,250,000 reserves, by voluntary enlistment, without compelling men to serve against their will? Surely, as a permanent policy, the question answers itself. It is only a question of making the service sufficiently attractive. We seem to be assuming that it is a sacrifice to go into the Army; that it is the most unpleasant occupation in the United States, and one which every boy instinctively avoids. That should be far from the case. In time of war the Army is dangerous; but if we prepare adequately we should not be at war, and the Army for the most part is a peacetime, highly specialized occupation, with only a chance of danger. Experience shows that men do not avoid an occupation because there is a chance of danger. There are dangerous civilian occupations—work with high-tension wires, work in tunnel construction, work in coal mines—and there is never any difficulty in finding men interested in those occupations. The Army has many advantages—a clean and regular life without responsibility, an attraction in the very discipline and order which appeals to some men and offends others very greatly.

There are few occupations in which men could be induced to volunteer for $21 a month, and yet today we are enlisting over 25,000 men a month. In July we enlisted over 30,000.

There has not been any serious effort to enlist men. In the fiscal year which ended the 1st of July we spent $50,000 for advertising. I suppose Henry Wallace spent 20 times that much in advertising the farm program, and the various referendums which were held on different features of the farm program.

In New York City this year it was necessary to fill a position as sanitation man at a salary of $1,800 a year, which, considering the cost of living in New York City, is not very much more than Army pay plus the support which the man receives. There were 84,000 applications from New York City alone. There are 2,000,000 men on W. P. A., and there are over 200,000 in the C. C. C. camps, and many others out of work. We may not have the right to require these men, as a condition of Government aid, to accept employment in the Army; but surely we can induce many of these men to prefer the Army to their present position if we make the Army only reasonably attractive.

The Army should be an occupation which appeals to men on its own advantages. I see no reason why a soldier should not receive the equivalent of $1,000 a year. If we assume that lodging, board, and clothing are worth $40 a month to him, the cash pay might well be another $40 a month. This would mean a total pay roll of about $360,000,000 for 750,000 men, which does not seem excessive if the total cost of the Army is to be $2,000,000,000. We are paying over a billion and a half dollars to the men on W. P. A., at the rate of $60 a month. The soldier is entitled to superior treatment.

The Army is also at a disadvantage, in that it deprives a man of the power to change his occupation and acquire a better job. If the enlistment period is to remain 3 years, a man should have a right to resign in peacetime on 90 days' notice after the first year. Provisions might well be worked out to permit a permanent assignment of most of his pay to maintain dependents, as in the case of the C. C. C. Probably some trial will be necessary to determine just what terms will make the Army as attractive to the average man as many other jobs furnished by industry, but certainly there is a point at which it can be made attractive and can be maintained on a volunteer basis.

It should be equally possible to build up a reserve by volunteer methods. If military training camps should be established, and an appeal made to boys who are leaving high school or college in June of each year before they obtain jobs, a very large percentage would be glad to take the training which is offered. Besides maintenance, they could be paid some small salary. If military training is a good thing for boys, then it should be possible to convince them that it is a good thing for boys. Those who like the life can be given advanced courses, and many are likely to take up the Army as a life work. Approximately 1,150,000 boys come of age each year; and surely it should be possible, even in peacetime, to persuade 200,000 of them to take the training offered by the Government. In times like the present it should be possible to obtain a much greater percentage. Again, the purpose should be to make the camps attractive in themselves, instead of prison camps into which boys must be forced.

I have introduced here a substitute bill providing for setting up training camps, authorizing the increase of the Regular Army to 500,000, which makes 750,000 with the National Guard, and authorizing the President to set up training camps and operate the entire plan on a volunteer basis.

It is argued that the draft is advantageous because the Army wants all the men at one time so that it can train them. I heard that testimony before the Committee on Military Affairs. It is suddenly announced this morning in the New York Times by General Shedd that, far from calling all of them at one time and far from calling them on October 15, they are going to call 55,000 National Guard men on the 15th of September and 55,000 more on the 15th of October, then 75,000 men in the draft on the 15th of October, 50,000 on the 1st of November, and 65,000 more draftees on the 15th of November, 100,000 in December, and 100,000 in January. So that the argument that they prefer the draft so that they can start training all at once is completely wiped out by the program of the War Department itself.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. TAFT. Certainly.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Did the Senator ever hear a more outrageous proposition advanced in the history of this country than that advanced by General Shedd yesterday, that the War Department's plans were being held up by an apparently endless delay in Congress, when the Senate of the United States has indulged in a 3-day debate so far on a plan to radically change what has been the fundamental policy of the United States from the foundation of the Government down? As a matter of fact, everyone knows, and everyone has known all the time, that some excuse would be found for postponing the operation of the draft, because, as many inept things as this administration has done, nothing in the whole history of it would indicate that they were going to be so inept as to have hundreds of thousands of mothers going down to the stations kissing their boys good-bye to go off to the Army in time of peace within 3 or 4 weeks before an election.

Mr. TAFT. I agree with the Senator. I thought General Shedd's tendency at least to shift the responsibility to Congress was outrageous, because it is contradicted by the very program that is presented. If they can call 75,000 men on the 15th of October for training under a selective-service plan, they can call 400,000 men. The only reason for not calling the greater number must be that they have not the camps and the facilities and the equipment to put that many men to work on the 15th of October. As a matter of fact, I do not believe that the Army can call anyone under the draft by the 15th of October. I have looked through the testimony, and I cannot find any definite statement on the subject, but when the draft bill was passed in 1917, it was passed on the 20th of May, and the registration date was set immediately for the 5th of June. They went ahead and registered the men, but they did not actually get anyone into camp until September, 4 months from the time the bill was passed. So that if we passed the pending bill on the 20th of August on the same theory it would be December before the Army could actually get any of the men under the draft.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. TAFT. Certainly.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. What the Senator says about the draft machinery during the last war is entirely correct, but they drafted the whole National Guard of the United States into the Federal service on August 5, 1917, and 2 months later, after the National Guard had been drafted into the Federal service, I saw men drilling barefoot, because they had worn out the civilian shoes they had brought to camp with them; they were drilling barefoot, with their feet bleeding, in the State of Missouri, in camp, and I hope that we will never again, particularly in time of peace, have the experience of calling men before there is any equipment for them, and seeing them drill barefoot, with their feet bleeding, when there is no necessity for it.

Mr. SHIPSTEAD. Mr. President, I noticed in the paper some days ago that men who had enlisted and who had been ordered to different destinations to which they were assigned were instructed to remain at home until called because there were no facilities to take care of them.

Mr. TAFT. I think that today there is a great lack of facilities, and I have no doubt that the reason for the postponement is the fact that they have no places in which to put them if they call them out.

Mr. SHIPSTEAD. Why should they call them out then?

Mr. TAFT. I am not fully advised.

10. THE IMMEDIATE EMERGENCY DOES NOT REQUIRE THE DRAFT

It is said that, admitting the truth of my arguments against a permanent draft, there is an immediate emergency during the next 6 months which can be met in no other way. Of course, the bill is not confined to 6 months or a year. But, in my opinion, there is no emergency which cannot be met by volunteer methods.

Even if the Germans should conquer England, I see no reason to think that they will attack the United States or that within any short period they could attack the United States. They must consolidate their positions in Europe, Asia, and Africa. They must change the character of their air force. They must accumulate and organize a vast transport fleet; they must capture and reorganize at least a part of the British Fleet. I believe we have time to prepare carefully and completely and in accordance with American principles to meet the continued emergency which will exist for the next 10 years.

But let us assume that we must have by next spring an army of 900,000 men, as proposed by General Marshall. The draft itself is not a tremendously hasty method of securing men. As I have pointed out, during the World War the act was passed on May 20, and it was September before 250,000 men were inducted into service, and October before another 150,000 men were inducted into service. Apparently we would not secure these men, therefore, until December and January, and they would not be trained by April. We have 270,000 men in the Regular Army, and, omitting 40,000 men for the Air Corps for whom we have no airplanes, we will have the full quota of 375,000 by the 1st of December. We have authorized the calling out of the National Guard and 50,000 more in the other Reserves, who can be effectively added to the Regular Army. This would give us a total, as I have stated, of about 650,000. Assuming that General Marshall is correct in asking for 900,000 trained men under arms by April, I have not the slightest doubt that 250,000 more men can be raised by volunteer methods and raised just as quickly as they could be raised under the draft; raised just as quickly as it is proposed that they be raised under the schedule set out by General Shedd.

I have suggested the means by which the Army may be made an attractive occupation, and that should be done whether the draft is adopted or not. It is said the voluntary-enlistment plan has broken down. Of course, that is utterly untrue. I saw an article in the paper yesterday which indicated that the Navy was behind in its enlistments. Admiral Nimitz testified, when he was asked whether they had any difficulty in getting voluntary enlistments or not:

> So far we have not. We have today about 7,000 men on the waiting list, waiting to go into the training stations. About 2,500 of those are men whose papers have all been completed.

The voluntary-enlistment plan has not broken down. In spite of inadequate pay and 3-year enlistments, it has accomplished everything which has been asked of it. Up to this time Congress has not even declared that a larger army is necessary. We can hardly blame the enlistment system for not providing an army which we have not actually authorized. No appeal has been made by the President for enlistment. Surely a general campaign, led by the President, and organized on a voluntary basis throughout the United States, can secure even half a million men if that many should be necessary. There are many million men unemployed.

I understand the Army has a definite plan prepared for what is known as civilian-volunteer effort. I notice in the United States News of August 9 the following statement:

> A few months ago the Army had preparations nearly completed for an intensive recruiting drive, but it was decided that such a program would be inadequate to meet emergency needs, and all planning since then has been centered on obtaining compulsory military conscription.

It is said that such an appeal will draw men from industries where they are needed. This seems mere nonsense. The appeal should be not so much to patriotism, as to the merit and attractiveness of Army service; and it is not likely to draw any skilled men except for skilled jobs. Furthermore, it would be easy for the recruiting officers, cooperating with Mr. Hillman's training division, to refuse to take such men, for the bill itself provides that persons between 18 and 45 years of age shall be afforded an opportunity to enlist if they are acceptable to the land or naval forces for such training and service. Obviously, if a man were more valuable as a mechanic, the Army and Navy would have means of finding that he was not acceptable for military or naval service.

Suppose that we started some new industry and advertised that we could use 300,000 men without skill or training. Do you suppose there would be the slightest difficulty in obtaining that many men if the pay were reasonable? There would be literally millions of applications if such an announcement were made.

I am absolutely convinced that an attempt to raise whatever army is necessary by a volunteer appeal, if that attempt has the wholehearted cooperation of the administration and the Army, will unquestionably meet with success; that it will furnish 400,000 men before the complicated draft is working, and a steady flow of personnel for training.

CONCLUSION

Finally, Mr. President, I refer again to the fact that the Chairman of the Military Affairs Committee has referred to the draft as a tragic necessity. The draft would be tragic but I do not agree that it is a necessity. There are other means that can be taken, means more consistent with Americanism, means more likely to preserve the liberty and freedom for which America was established, means likely to secure a better army. Surely if we draft 1 boy in 10 by lot, there are many who will be continually disgruntled at their bad luck and only anxious to get through the 12 months as best they may. Surely if we treat the Army as an occupation which any man might prefer, and take those who do prefer it, we will have a more earnest, interested, permanent, and enthusiastic force than if we treat it as an occupation to be avoided, for which men can be obtained only by force. In this moment of excitement and hysteria, do not break down the fundamental principles of the American Republic. Do not overestimate the emergency and sink all the principles we love in the slough of totalitarian defense.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the amendment of the junior Senator from Oklahoma [Mr. LEE] to the committee amendment, proposing to raise the base pay of soldiers.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. HILL in the chair). Eighty-seven Senators having answered to their names, a quorum is present.

The question is on the amendment of the junior Senator from Oklahoma to the committee amendment.

Mr. ADAMS. Mr. President, I desire to seek a little information with reference to the amendment offered by the Senator from Oklahoma. The Senator from Oklahoma was here a few moments ago, but is not now present. My inquiry deals with the relative scale set out in the Senator's amendment and the present Army scale. What is the proposed change?

Mr. SHEPPARD. Mr. President, the Senator from Oklahoma will be here presently.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Mr. President, pending the return of the Senator from Oklahoma, I can tell the Senator from Colorado this much about the pending amendment, that its purpose is to put the Army on the same base pay scale that the Navy is on already. In other words, up to the present time the Navy has been drawing about 30 percent more pay, or almost 30 percent more pay, than the Army, and this proposal would simply put the Army on the same basis that the Navy already is on.

Mr. BARKLEY. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. ADAMS. I yield.

Mr. BARKLEY. The present discrepancy in the pay between the Army and the Navy rose largely out of classification of men, in the Navy especially. For instance, a man can join the Navy at $21 a month, and in 4 months he may draw $36 a month, whereas a soldier in the Army, entering the service at the rate of $21 per month, has to wait quite a long period before he receives an increase in pay.

The pending amendment does not exactly put the Army and Navy on the same basis, but it comes as near doing so as is mathematically possible, taking into account the different classifications in the Army and Navy, as I understand.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Mr. President, will the Senator from Colorado yield to me?

Mr. ADAMS. I yield.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. I understand that at the present time, while the entrance pay of the Navy is the same as that of the Army, $21 a month, more than 96 percent, within 4 weeks after they have enlisted in the Navy, receive $30 a month. The amendment proposed by the Senator from Oklahoma simply proposes to give the Army a chance to receive approximately the pay the Navy gets.

Mr. BARKLEY. That is true in large measure, but the amendment does not propose exactly to adjust the pay of the two services.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. They cannot be exactly adjusted, but the amendment provides as close an approach to it as, I understand, the War Department has been able to figure out.

Mr. SHEPPARD. The War Department is in favor of the change.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. The Senator from Texas introduced a bill dealing with the subject.

Mr. SHEPPARD. I introduced a bill on that subject. The proposal was favorably recommended by the War Department after careful study.

Mr. RUSSELL. Mr. President, I should like to know what effect the amendment offered by the Senator from Oklahoma would have on the pay of enlisted men in the Marine Corps. I have heard a great deal said about the injustice done to the men in the Army, and I am in favor of correcting that injustice; but I wish to say that the enlisted man in the Marine Corps is paid only $21 per month, and I understand his advance in pay is very slow, as slow, perhaps, as the advance in pay of the man in the Army.

Mr. SHEPPARD. His advance in pay is as slow as that of the man in the Army, and I understood some Senator would present an amendment to take care of the men in the Marine Corps, in line with the proposal contained in the pending amendment.

Mr. RUSSELL. I should like to see such an amendment offered, because if we are to increase the base pay of the men in the Army, the men in the Marine Corps should not be overlooked.

Mr. SHEPPARD. The Senator is correct, but the Military Affairs Committee does not have jurisdiction over the Marine Corps or naval affairs.

Mr. MALONEY. Mr. President, will the Senator from Georgia yield to me?

Mr. RUSSELL. If I have the floor, I shall gladly yield to the Senator from Connecticut.

Mr. MALONEY. I wish to say to the Senator from Georgia that in a substitute proposal for the Burke-Wadsworth bill, which I have offered, and in which I have tried to fix the base pay, so far as the Army is concerned, I have endeavored to take into account the problem so far as the Marine Corps is concerned.

Mr. RUSSELL. I was sure the Senator from Connecticut, with his accustomed thoroughness, took care of the men in the Marine Corps in his substitute measure. I do not know that I can vote for the Senator's substitute, however, and a provision with respect to the Marine Corps may be left out of the legislation unless it is provided for in the pending amendment.

Mr. BARKLEY. Mr. President, will the Senator yield there?

Mr. RUSSELL. I yield.

Mr. BARKLEY. Of course, none of us, if it is possible to avoid it, wants to have any glaring or any substantial difference between the pay of the various services. But, of course, this bill deals only with the Army. The question whether or not it is possible for us to try to deal with Marine Corps and Navy pay in an Army bill may present itself to the Senate, although it is possible to write language which would take care of both of them.

The Senator from Oklahoma [Mr. LEE] is now present, and he is in a position to explain his own amendment.

Mr. RUSSELL. The bill does not relate only to the land forces of the United States, but, as I understand, those who are called into service under the provisions of the bill may be assigned to training in the Army, the Navy, the Marine Corps, or the Air Corps. While we are legislating to bring about an increase in compensation, a part of the national defense so valuable as is the Marine Corps should not be overlooked.

Mr. LEE. Mr. President, the amendment does not apply to the Marine Corps. The amendment was drawn by the Army, and is recommended by the Army. The Marine Corps is in the same position as the Army. The pay of the Marine Corps is low. It should be raised; and if the Senate wants it raised by this bill, it could be done by providing for an increase in the monthly base pay of enlisted men of the Army and the Marine Corps.

Mr. RUSSELL. I hope the Senator from Oklahoma will suggest such a modification of his own amendment. If he does not, Mr. President, and if the amendment be in order, I shall offer an amendment to the amendment to include the Marine Corps.

Mr. LEE. I believe the best way to handle it would be to modify my own amendment by adding in line 2, after "Army", the words "and Marine Corps."

Mr. SHEPPARD. The Senator from South Dakota [Mr. GURNEY] had an amendment pending to that effect.

Mr. GURNEY. I do not have an amendment pending, but I hope the Senator from Oklahoma will include the Marine Corps as well as the Army.

Mr. LEE. I ask unanimous consent to modify my amendment.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator does not need unanimous consent. He may modify his own amendment.

Mr. LEE. I modify my amendment in line 2 so as to read:

The monthly base pay of enlisted men of the Army and Marine Corps shall be as follows:

Mr. MALONEY. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. LEE. I yield.

Mr. MALONEY. I should like to obtain permission from the Senator from Oklahoma to have printed at this point in the RECORD the portion of my amendment dealing with this subject, because I hope later to obtain a vote on what has been referred to as the Maloney substitute for the Burke-Wadsworth bill. I should like to have the pay section of the amendment printed in the RECORD at this point so that Senators and others may have an opportunity to consider it before the Senate is called upon to vote on the amendment, which at that point would be a substitute for the Lee amendment, if the Lee amendment should be adopted.

Mr. LEE. Of course, I agree to have a portion of the Senator's amendment printed at this point in the RECORD.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to the request of the Senator from Connecticut?

There being no objection, the portion of the amendment neferred to was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

SEC. 12. (a) Effective on the first day of the first month following the date of enactment of this act, section 9 of the act of June 10, 1922 (relating to the pay of enlisted men of the Army and Marine Corps), is amended by striking out "enlisted men of the fourth grade, $54; enlisted men of the fifth grade, $42; enlisted men of the sixth grade, $30; enlisted men of the seventh grade, $21," and inserting in lieu thereof the following: "enlisted men of the fourth grade, $60; enlisted men of the fifth grade, $54; enlisted men of the sixth grade, $36; enlisted men of the seventh grade, $30."

(b) Effective on the first day of the first month following the date of enactment of this act, section 10 of the act of June 10, 1922 (relating to the pay of enlisted men of the Navy and Coast Guard), is amended by striking out "seventh grade, $21" and inserting in lieu thereof "seventh grade, $30."

Mr. O'MAHONEY. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. LEE. I yield.

Mr. O'MAHONEY. I should like to understand what difference there is between the text of the amendment which the Senator from Oklahoma is now offering and the comparable portion of the proposed substitute to be offered by the Senator from Connecticut. In other words, is there any difference between the two proposals with respect to the pay of enlisted men in the Army?

Mr. LEE. I am not advised as to the amendment of the Senator from Connecticut. I wish to say, however, that the amendment which has been offered would raise the pay of the soldier and of the marine, in the seventh grade, from $21 to $30. It would raise the sixth grade pay from $30 to $36. It would raise the fifth grade pay from $42 to $54. It would raise the fourth grade pay from $54 to $60, and leave the pay of the other grades as it now is.

Mr. O'MAHONEY. Mr. President, will the Senator yield for a question?

Mr. LEE. I yield.

Mr. O'MAHONEY. At this point I direct my inquiry to the Senator from Connecticut. In what respect does his amendment dealing with the pay of enlisted men differ from the amendment of the Senator from Oklahoma?

Mr. MALONEY. I regret to say that I am not entirely familiar with the amendment offered by the Senator from Oklahoma. I have just sent to the desk the only copy of my amendment which I have. My amendment proposes to raise the base pay of the Army, and at the same time the base pay of members of the Marine Corps, to $30 a month, by changing the pay act adopted in June 1922 relating to those two branches of our armed forces. I assume that we arrive at the same place.

Mr. O'MAHONEY. If the Senator from Oklahoma will bear with me, I should like to ask the Senator from Connecticut whether or not his amendment is in accordance with the recommendation which was made to the Committee on Military Affairs by the General Staff when the pay question was under discussion?

Mr. MALONEY. I assume so. I do not recall the recommendations of the Army. In drafting this amendment I was prompted by the feeling that members of the Army and Marine Corps have been discriminated against in the matter of pay.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Mr. President, will the Senator yield to me to repeat something which took place this morning in that connection?

Mr. LEE. I yield.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. As showing the justification for the Senator's amendment and the proposal of the Senator from Connecticut, I am informed that Colonel Knox, the new Secretary of the Navy, testified this morning before the House Military Affairs Committee that the naval service is far more attractive to prospective recruits than any other branch of the service, because members of the naval forces receive better pay and because they are permitted to learn a trade while they are in the Navy. The Secretary said that the Navy did not anticipate any difficulty in getting all the men needed for the prospective enlargement of the Navy. Of course, it is well known that there is a waiting list of volunteers for the Navy, which seems to me to be a conclusive demonstration of the fact that the Army and the Marine Corps have been discriminated against in the matter of pay, and that a situation has been deliberately created by which the Navy is far more attractive to recruits than the Army or the Marine Corps, which have to do the fighting at far less pay.

Mr. O'MAHONEY. If I may trespass upon the Senator's good nature and time for a moment longer, let me say that I do not have the privilege of serving on the Committee on Military Affairs. Therefore I was not present when this matter was presented to the Commitee on Military Affairs. I rise at this time as a member of the Appropriations Committee, which eventually will have to provide funds by which one or the other of these provisions will be financed. I am heartily in accord with the suggestion that all discrimination between the pay of enlisted men in the Navy and that of enlisted men in the Army should be completely eliminated, and I want to vote to eliminate that discrimination; but I am altogether uncertain as to which of the two amendments will accomplish the purpose I have in mind, and what the difference is between the two.

Mr. MALONEY. Mr. President, will the Senator from Oklahoma yield to me?

Mr. LEE. If I may have an opportunity, I think I can answer the question. I yield to the Senator from Connecticut.

Mr. MALONEY. I merely wish to say to the Senator from Wyoming, in addition to what I have heretofore said, that the amendment which I propose is an effort to wipe out such further discrepancies as may exist. I have also provided in my amendment a slight change in the regulations concerning the Navy and the Coast Guard, because it is my understanding that there is an instance in which members of the Navy, for a short period of time, receive less than $30 a month; and in an effort to bring them all into the same pay class I have included the Marine Corps, the Navy, and the Coast Guard.

Mr. LEE. Mr. President, reading from the testimony of Captain Ira Swift, of the War Department General Staff, Personnel Division, at page 122 of the hearings which were held on the original bill introduced by the Senator from Texas [Mr. SHEPPARD], chairman of the Military Affairs Committee, Senate bill 2224, Captain Swift said:

> The Navy enlisted man draws an average of $877.27 a year, as contrasted with $569.85 for the soldier. These figures speak for themselves. While variations in the pay system give one service certain allowances not accorded others, so that, depending upon the basic assumptions, this picture may be changed in minor detail, nevertheless, whatever adjustment may be made as to such items, the foregoing essential disparity will not be materially reduced.
> The soldier, as compared to the sailor, is a very poorly paid servant of our Government. The hearings on the Navy pay bill of 1899 reflected the opposite situation, the effort being then to accord parity to the sailor. The arguments then utilized in behalf of the Navy can now be used, in essentially the same terms, on behalf of the Army.
> These disparities are due to a number of factors, including: Differences in base pay of certain grades, differences in longevity pay, variations in opportunity for promotion.

My amendment takes care of differences in longevity pay. At the end of 16 years a man in the Navy would be drawing the same percentage of his pay as a man in the Army would draw at the end of 20 years. That adjustment, and all other adjustments of that kind recommended by the Army, are in my amendment.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the modified amendment of the Senator from Oklahoma [Mr. LEE] to the amendment reported by the committee.

Mr. MALONEY. Mr. President, I should like to ask a question of the Senator from Oklahoma, if I may. I read now from the Senator's amendment on line 7, page 1:

> Except that the monthly base pay of enlisted men with less than 4 months' service during their first enlistment period and of enlisted men of the seventh grade whose inefficiency or other unfitness has been determined under regulations prescribed by the Secretary of War, shall be $21.

I am wondering if, under that language, members of the Army, soldiers, might not get $21 a month for an unlimited period of time during their enlistments.

Mr. LEE. I have been trying to find the statement of the officer of the War Department who dealt with that matter and who said that 4 months is the period during which an enlisted man is considered to be a recruit. A recruit is certainly not given the pay that a trained soldier is given during the period of service, which is usually 4 months, when he is a recruit. That was the language he recommended, and he explained that in his testimony. I cannot put my finger on the testimony at the moment.

Mr. MALONEY. I do not need the testimony to remind the Senator that his amendment goes much further than he assumes it does, or perhaps it does not go nearly so far as he thinks it does. I will read the language again to the Senator.

> Except that the monthly base pay of enlisted men with less than 4 months' service during their first enlistment period—> and of enlisted men of the seventh grade whose inefficiency or other unfitness has been determined under regulations prescribed by the Secretary of War, shall be $21.

That covers the probationary period to which the Senator refers. Then his amendment proceeds to say:

So if the Secretary of War determines that any or all the men inducted into the military service have not proper efficiency ratings, the Army may continue to pay them $21 a month for so long as it desires. Am I not correct in that?

Mr. LEE. That is correct.

Mr. SCHWELLENBACH. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. MALONEY. I yield.

Mr. SCHWELLENBACH. I should like to ask whether or not there is a similar provision in the law in reference to naval pay?

Mr. LEE. I cannot answer that question. Both Senators know that in drawing such legislation as this there is a certain form that is usually followed, which, I am sure, is the case in this instance. But, as I have said, this amendment was drafted by the Army's drafting counsel, and, I presume, it is necessary for them to have some such protection against those in the "awkward squad" who never learn. I myself was once in the "awkward squad." [Laughter.]

Mr. MALONEY. I do not find myself in agreement with the Senator from Oklahoma. If a man continues to be so inefficient after a probationary training period in the Army that he is not worth $30 a month, it seems to me that he is not the kind of soldier we want in the Army.

Mr. BARKLEY. Mr. President——

Mr. MALONEY. I yield to the Senator from Kentucky.

Mr. BARKLEY. I wonder whether in the present law, under which the base pay is $21 a month, there is any such provision as this, reducing the pay of the inefficient soldier during the first 4 months of his first enlistment below $21 a month?

Mr. MALONEY. There is not, I will say to the Senator from Kentucky.

Mr. BARKLEY. If there is no such provision in the present law with respect to the $21 base pay, I am wondering what is the need to inject a new equation into this base-pay measure by providing that during the first 4 months of his first enlistment any man found deficient or inefficient shall continue to draw the $21 a month, I presume, for the 4 months' period?

Mr. MALONEY. That is not in my amendment; that is in the amendment of the Senator from Oklahoma.

Mr. BARKLEY. I understand that, but I wonder if the Senator from Oklahoma or the Senator from Texas can advise us whether any reason has been given by those who drew this amendment in the War Department for making such a provision for inefficient soldiers during the first 4 months of their enlistment, whereas there is nothing in the present law on that subject?

Mr. LEE. There was nothing discussed in the hearings concerning that question. The only reference was to the period when a soldier was considered to be a recruit, and Captain Swift pointed out that a recruit's services were not worth as much as those of a trained soldier.

Mr. BARKLEY. Mr. President, will the Senator from Connecticut yield further?

Mr. MALONEY. I yield.

Mr. BARKLEY. Inasmuch as there is no such provision in the present law which fixes the base pay at $21 a month—and it seems to be new language—I wonder if the Senator from Oklahoma would be willing to eliminate the provision making this exception?

Mr. LEE. Before I agree to that, I should like to know the language with reference to the Navy. This provision has been carefully worked out, and I would not feel like taking the responsibility of changing it.

Mr. BARKLEY. The only effect of the elimination would be simply to make the base pay of all soldiers $30 a month; there would be no $21 pay scale in the Army.

Mr. RUSSELL. Mr. President——

Mr. MALONEY. I yield.

Mr. RUSSELL. If that were done, it would be necessary to include a provision with reference to the Army and the Marine Corps because, as I understand, the base pay of those entering the lowest grade in those services is $21 a month.

Mr. BARKLEY. But that does not last long.

Mr. RUSSELL. It lasts during the first 4 months' period referred to by the Senator from Oklahoma.

Mr. GURNEY. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Connecticut yield to the Senator from South Dakota?

Mr. MALONEY. I yield.

Mr. GURNEY. I should like to give to the Senate information that I have in the form of a letter, dated August 6, as to the extra cost of this proposed amendment. I will read it. It is from Gen. William E. Shedd and is dated August 6:

DEAR SENATOR GURNEY: In accordance with your request, the following estimates of the increased cost of the pay of the Army, which will result in case the provisions of S. 2224 are made effective, are submitted:

1. For the Regular Army of 375,000 enlisted men organized as at present, the increased cost for grades will be $30,200,000 and for increased longevity $4,500,000 on an annual basis.

2. For the National Guard inducted into the Federal service at present strength (240,000) on the same pay basis as the Regular Army, the increased cost for grades will be $16,958,000 on an annual basis. The National Guard will have practically no longevity pay initially.

3. Assuming that the proposed bill which provides for compulsory selective military training and service is approved and that as a result there are inducted into the Army 400,000 trainees as of October 1, 1940, and 400,000 additional on April 1, 1941, the increased cost for grades for the 400,000 inducted in October will be $18,000,000 for the remainder of the fiscal year. The 400,000 inducted in April will receive no increase in pay during this fiscal year. These trainees will have practically no longevity pay.

Sincerely yours,

WM. E. SHEDD,
Brigadier General, Assistant Chief of Staff.

Mr. BARKLEY. Mr. President, if the Senator from Connecticut will yield, I will suggest that I think it would have been just as easy to have said in one paragraph or sentence of that letter that if 400,000 should be inducted next April they would draw so much per annum. It leaves them entirely out of the calculation, although the writer assumes that they are going to be inducted.

Mr. GURNEY. I think, if the Senator will study the amendment of the Senator from Oklahoma, he will find that for the first 4 months' trainees will receive not $30 a month but $21 a month.

Mr. LEE. That is correct.

Mr. GURNEY. So, of course, there are not 4 months between April and June 30, 1941, and there would not be any increase in that period.

Mr. BARKLEY. I thought the Senator was trying to arrive at the annual increase in cost, not only of the Regular Army but the National Guard and those who may be called into the service, regardless of this particular fiscal year.

Mr. GURNEY. The writer of the letter seeks to answer more than one question. One portion of the letter furnishes information as to longevity pay on an annual basis; then, in another portion, the writer says that for the remainder of the fiscal year this amendment will make the pay about the same as that in the Navy, because in the Navy, for the first 4 months a recruit serves he gets $21, and under this bill the men inducted into the service will also receive $21 for the first 4 months.

Mr. MALONEY. Mr. President, I am not going to delay the Senate by a discussion of the amendment offered by the Senator from Oklahoma. I trust he will not consider me presumptuous when I offer to him the suggestion that he let his amendment go over, that it may be further considered. It is obvious that it contains the risk of a $21 per month salary without end, and I notice upon further examination of the proposal that his pay increases only for a limited period of time, that it does not definitely change the pay status of the Army, and I do not think Senators have had a sufficient opportunity to examine the proposal carefully. I think probably, if the Senator would be willing to let it go over, we might have the benefit of a further opinion from the Army and from other Members of the Senate, and we might be able to work out better language and a more satisfactory proposal.

Mr. LEE. Mr. President, I believe we should vote on this amendment at this time. It has already been worked out by the Army. They know what they are doing on that subject.

Mr. O'MAHONEY. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. MALONEY. I yield.

Mr. O'MAHONEY. I desire to ask the Senator from Oklahoma a question. If the Senate of the United States is to bear the responsibility for enacting this legislation, should we be content merely to accept the Senator's statement that this is satisfactory to the Army, when there are obvious questions——

Mr. LEE. No; the Senate will not have to do that. Senators can read here the statement of the representative of the Army that it was their bill, and they recommended its passage. It would not be necessary for the Senate to take my word for it.

Mr. O'MAHONEY. If the Senate adopts the proposal, it becomes the Senate's bill.

Mr. LEE. The Senator from Connecticut said "wait until we can consult the Army." Here is the Army's bill.

Mr. MALONEY. No; the Senator from Connecticut did not say that. The Senator from Connecticut said "we might have the benefit of a further opinion or advice from the Army."

Mr. SCHWELLENBACH. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. MALONEY. I yield.

Mr. SCHWELLENBACH. It seems to me that what we are trying to do is to make an adjustment in Army and Marine Corps pay so as to have there the same situation that exists in the Navy.

I have listened very carefully to everything that has been said, but I do not think anybody has yet said that the amendment which the Senator proposes does make that exact adjustment. I think we are entitled to have somebody—either the author of the amendment or the chairman of the committee—tell us definitely that this amendment does make exactly the same adjustment.

Mr. MALONEY. I am able to tell the Senator that it does not make that adjustment.

Mr. LEE. Mr. President, if the Senator will yield, he finds himself at variance with Captain Swift, who says that it makes that adjustment.

Mr. MALONEY. Will the Senator tell me where I can find that statement?

Mr. GURNEY. Mr. President, if I may interrupt, the Senator will find that information and comparison in the hearings which were held by the subcommittee on Senate bill 2224 on April 24, 1940. It appears in the schedule opposite page 123 of the hearings. So far as I can see, it equalizes the pay between the three branches. At least, the pay for each grade in each branch would be the same if this amendment should be adopted. Due to the different rates of advancement in the Navy as compared with the Marine Corps and the Army, the percentages of those in the Navy who would get a certain pay for a certain length of time might be a little different; but with this amendment giving the private in the Army and the Marine Corps $21 a month for the first 4 months, I believe the percentages would be about the same after the adoption of this amendment in all three branches—the Army, the Marine Corps, and the Navy.

Mr. O'MAHONEY. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. MALONEY. I yield.

Mr. O'MAHONEY. I ask the Senator's indulgence in order that I may make some comment upon what the Senator from South Dakota has just said.

I have turned to the hearings to which he refers—page 123 of the hearings which were held as of April 24, 1940—and I find there a chart which undertakes to picture the disparity in the pay of four different branches of the armed forces of the United States. One column shows that the base pay for the Army now is $569.85 on the annual basis, and that the base pay of the Marine Corps is $546.62. That is to say, the Marine Corps is more poorly paid than is the Army. The base pay of the Navy is $877.27, much greater than either the Army or the Marine Corps, while the base pay of the Coast Guard is greater than any of the others, namely, $980.90.

The question which occurs to me to ask the sponsor of this amendment and those who are urging it is whether or not the figures which we are now asked to approve eliminate these disparities.

Mr. LEE. They do.

Mr. O'MAHONEY. All right—on the basis of the Coast Guard, on the basis of the Navy, on the basis of the Marine Corps, or of all three?

Mr. LEE. On the basis of the Navy.

Mr. O'MAHONEY. Then am I to understand that if the Senator's amendment is adopted the base pay in the Army, instead of being $569.85, as now, will be $877.27?

Mr. LEE. I could not answer to the exact dollar that it would be, but it would be in line with that.

Mr. O'MAHONEY. Mr. President, I, for one, feel that the Senate should not be satisfied with an answer that what we are going to do would be "in line" with something. My inquiry is to develop what the actual facts are, because eventually we are going to have to pay for this.

Mr. LEE. If the Senator will yield, the question cannot be answered exactly, because one department of the Government might promote their men faster, and when they are promoted faster that changes the total amount of average pay, but this amendment will put it as nearly in line as it can be figured.

Mr. O'MAHONEY. Yes; but the figures I am reading have nothing to do with promotion. They deal with base pay.

Mr. LEE. But the base pay is figured on the average from a recruit to a master sergeant, whose pay is $126 a month. For instance, in the Navy, instead of having their specialist pay added to their regular base pay, they have a rank. Let me show the Senator what I mean.

Here is a private, first class, but he is a cook, and a cook draws a special pay. As a specialist, he draws $15 a month extra as cook. That makes his pay $45, but his longevity pay is based on 5 percent of his base pay, or 5 percent of $30 a month, not 5 percent of $45; but in the Navy it is not arranged in that way. Instead of having a specialty pay added to their base pay, they have a rank like machinist, and a man's rank determines his pay. It is not based on the same type of schedule, but this is figured out as carefully as the Army can work it out to adjust those differences.

For instance, in the Navy the first schedule of longevity pay is 10 percent of the men's pay, and the first schedule for the Army is 5 percent of their pay. At the end of 16 years a man in the Navy is drawing as longevity pay 25 percent of his total pay. If he is a machinist, and he is drawing $126 a month, 25 percent of that is added every month because of longevity. But in the Army, if he is a private, first class, and is still drawing $30 a month, although he may be a machinist, which might add $25 a month or more to his pay, he is not given the advantage of 5 percent of that specialist pay. He is still drawing only 5 percent of the base pay, which is 5 percent of $30 a month, and that is a discrimination against him.

I cannot answer the Senator in exact dollars and cents, because this is worked on an average. If the Senator will study the charts he will see that this works out the matter just as nearly as it can be worked out.

Mr. BARKLEY. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. MALONEY. I yield.

Mr. BARKLEY. If I understand the situation, in order to make the pay of the Army and Navy and Marine Corps and the other services precisely the same in all cases it would be necessary to inaugurate a new system of classification and a new system of promotion, because promotion is more rapid in the Navy than in the Army. The average naturally will be higher, based on the present classification and the rate of promotion. The amendment offered by the Senator comes as near equalizing the pay of the various services as it is possible to do without entirely rearranging the classification and rate of promotion. Is that true?

Mr. LEE. That is correct.

Mr. MALONEY. Mr. President, I said that I had no intention of detaining the Senate. While the RECORD will show that I have had the floor for some time, it will also show that other Members have been using the time.

I am not going to offer an objection to the amendment of the Senator from Oklahoma. I am sorry he is not willing to have it go over, because it seems to me it should be and could be considerably improved. He and I and the other Senators especially concerned with this subject who have offered amendments to it are anxious to arrive at the same result; that is, to have the pay of members of the Army, the Navy, the Marine Corps, and the Coast Guard a minimum of $30 a month. I wanted to point out some of the discrepancies, or what I thought were discrepancies, of the Senator's amendment:

First, that it does or would permit men to continue in the Navy at $20 a month for years, as a matter of fact. Next, that there is a limitation of time on the pay increase. It stops in 1945, according to the Senator's amendment. I think the amendment could be greatly improved, but I must confess that it is, in my judgment, a great improvement over the present situation in the Army.

I shall not vote against the Senator's amendment, because I will not vote against an amendment which offers something better for enlisted men of the Army. But since he will not delay it, at a later time, as the opportunity presents, I shall offer a substitute for his amendment, which I hope may be more in keeping with the justice which the enlisted men of the service deserve.

Mr. O'MAHONEY. Mr. President, I should like to ask the Senator from Oklahoma to give a little attention to subparagraph (c) on page 2. It apparently makes a change in the pay of enlisted men of the sixth grade in the National Guard. It deals only with enlisted men of the sixth grade. What is the effect upon the change of the pay of members of the National Guard proposed by the Senator's amendment? I wonder if there is anything in the hearings about it. Perhaps the chairman of the Committee on Military Affairs may be able to tell us something about it.

Mr. LEE. The hearings did not contain anything on that point. The National Guard is paid on the basis of per diem compensation. The amendment refers to the sixth grade. I believed it was figured out as making the pay in line with that of the Regular Army pay.

Mr. O'MAHONEY. The thought which suggests itself to me is that the Senate has no information at all with respect to what alteration will be made in the compensation of one grade in the National Guard, and why that particular grade was selected for a change and why other grades were not selected for a change. I have just compared the Senator's amendment with the bill which was introduced, as I recall, by the Senator from Texas [Mr. SHEPPARD], the chairman of the Committee on Military Affairs, and upon which the committee hearings were held; and the measures are substantially identical.

Mr. LEE. They are identical, except that my amendment was changed so that it would be appropriate as an amendment to the pending bill.

Mr. O'MAHONEY. When the spokesmen for the General Staff came before the Committee on Military Affairs to give testimony with respect to this measure, was nothing said about the change the Army has recommended in the compensation of the National Guard?

Mr. LEE. The only reference to the National Guard was that the commutation of quarters for the National Guard amounted to $35 a month, whereas the enlisted men in the Army and other types on duty draw $22.50 a month. Let me read a paragraph or two from the testimony:

> The War Department pay program includes also certain provisions as to allowances which are not included in the present bill. One of these items would provide for statutory confirmation for payment of commutation of quarters for the three highest enlisted grades. Such payment is now being made on the basis of proper interpretation of existing law. Another item is the equalization of allowances under section 11, Pay Readjustment Act, for rental of quarters. The present rate of $22.50 per month prescribed for the great majority of men by Executive orders pursuant to the present law contrasts with a special higher rate established under appropriation acts since 1938, inclusive, for Regular Army enlisted men on National Guard duty. The higher rate should govern for all concerned—in other words, an enlisted man on National Guard duty draws $35 a month, commutation of quarters, and an enlisted man on other types of duty draws $22.50.
> The bill under discussion would permit specialist enlisted men to draw retired pay computed not only with reference to the base pay of the grade, but also with reference to the specialist pay of the rating held on retirement. This right was denied by a ruling of the Comptroller General (13 Comp. Dec. 769). Navy and Coast Guard enlisted men benefit by retired pay computed on the basis of the pay drawn for rating as well as for grade. The Army system, which does not contemplate grade for specialists, but accords them special pay according to special ability as such, has resulted in the unexpected byproduct of depriving enlisted specialists of proper retired pay. Correction of this disparity is part of the War Department program. Parity among the services can contemplate no other action.
> The increased cost of these items as now estimated would be as indicated on this chart, No. 84, which shows the details of the War Department program for enlisted men. The entire first-priority items, so far discussed, would cost an additional $27,709,146. The items covered in S. 2224 will involve increased costs as follows:

Mr. President, that is the bill which the Senator from Texas [Mr. SHEPPARD], the chairman of the commitee, introduced, which is identical with the bill just offered as an amendment.

If the Senate will allow me to amend the amendment to conform with the amendment I offered a while ago, I notice other places where it needs change to make it apply to the Marine Corps, and I will ask leave to amend the amendment on page 2, line 8, following the word "Army", by adding the words "and the Marine Corps." I also ask leave to amend on line 16, page 2, following the word "Army", by adding the words "or the Marine Corps." I wish to modify my amendment accordingly.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The parliamentarian advises the Chair that there should be an amendment on line 3, page 2, after the words "Secretary of War", to add the words "and the Secretary of the Navy, respectively."

Mr. LEE. Yes; because the Marine Corps is under the Navy.

Mr. O'MAHONEY. Mr. President, that suggests a question. Is there also the practice in the Marine Corps of paying very low compensation to certain enlisted men, under regulations, because of inefficiency or unfitness? I feel very strongly that the discrimination in pay should be eliminated, and I desire to support the Senator in eliminating all discrimination. I feel very strongly that one of the most effective things this country can do to raise an effective army is to provide proper compensation for the men in the Army.

I feel also that if we were to concentrate our attention upon the enlistment of a corps of highly trained mechanics, and were to offer them adequate pay we would make our Army conform to the lessons of the present war, rather than by building upon the basis of small compensation for men who may have to drill with inadequate arms.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Mr. President, will the Senator from Wyoming yield?

Mr. O'MAHONEY. I yield.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. The Senator evidently disagrees with the gentleman of the "Millionaires' Club" who framed and brought forward this conscription plan originally, who proposed that we pay the conscriptees $5 a month, and thought we were overpaying them when paying them anything.

Mr. O'MAHONEY. Mr. President, in discussing this or any other proposed legislation, I always try to avoid personalities. I cast no reflection upon the men who drafted the original bill. I am ready to acknowledge that they were patriotic citizens who were trying to serve their country. I do not wish to call them millionaires or paupers. I am not interested in that. I am interested in the fact that the Committee on Military Affairs of the Senate struck out the provision to which the Senator alludes, so that it is only a matter for argument now to cast some sort of an innuendo against the proposed legislation.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. I intend to cast no innuendo at all, if the Senator will permit me; but the Senator will certainly agree that it is much easier to be more or less impersonal and impervious to the necessities of these drafted men, who may have dependents, who may be taken out of private employment, when sitting in the sacred precincts of the Harvard Club, than it is for men who have to be taken away from their occupations and be put in the Army.

Mr. BURKE. Mr. President, will the Senator from Wyoming yield?

Mr. O'MAHONEY. I yield.

Mr. BURKE. There was a provision in the original bill for compensation of $5 a month, but, according to the theory of the bill, it could just as well have been $1, or 50 cents, or nothing at all, as it was contemplated in drafting the bill and in explaining it, and so stated, that it was considered that that was a matter with which Congress should deal in separate legislation, either by amendments to the Social Security Act, if it were found necessary to take people who had dependents, or by separate legislation of some kind. So eventually $5 was put in, as that is the amount the C. C. C. boys get for their own use. They get their keep and $30, but $25 is allotted to their dependents. So $5 was merely tentatively suggested because of that.

I think it comes with rather ill grace for the Senator to charge that simply because the money-mad millionaires, as he said, had something to do with the drafting of the bill, that the $5 provision was put in it. There was no such action on the part of the sponsors of the legislation. In fact, they recommended the change that was made in the Military Affairs Committee.

When the Senator from Connecticut offered his amendment in the nature of a substitute providing for equalizing the pay of all the grades, the sponsors of this legislation went along wholeheartedly.

Mr. President, since I am on my feet I will say that I now find myself rather in full accord with the senior Senator from Wyoming, that it would seem that to accomplish the purpose which everyone has in mind, it might be very much better to let this particular amendment go over, and let those who are particularly interested in it work the matter out with a little more care, so as to assure accomplishing the objective of putting the men in all the various grades upon an equality. Whether the base pay is made $30 a month, or if the Senator from Missouri wants to make it $50, it is still all right with me.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Mr. President, will the Senator yield to me so I may answer the Senator from Nebraska, and I shall promise not to interrupt the Senator from Wyoming again.

Mr. O'MAHONEY. I yield.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Mr. President, I am very happy that the Senator from Nebraska, as one of the putative co-authors of the bill, states that the sponsors of the bill, the millionaires meeting in the sacred precincts of the Harvard Club, were willing to leave anything at all to the discretion of the Congress in the exercise of its constitutonal functons.

Mr. BURKE. Mr. President, if the Senator from Wyoming will further yield——

Mr. O'MAHONEY. I yield.

Mr. BURKE. I call attention to the fact that while the particular measure in the form that I introduced it was drawn by the Military Training Camps Association, in conjunction with Army officers, I have explained very carefully that for a number of years a selective training and service bill has been in process of formulation, and that it was the purpose of my bill simply to bring the matter before the Military Affairs Committee, and that committee also had the advantage then of the very carefully worked out program of the Joint Army and Navy Committee on Selective Training and Service; so that was the basis upon which the bill which is now before the Senate was drawn.

Mr. O'MAHONEY. Mr. President, I have no doubt that the Senator from Nebraska has correctly described the situation. I think there is no profit in bandying phrases back and forth. They get us nowhere. We are studying probably the most important issue that has been presented to the Senate in many years, because it deals with the fundamental structure of our Nation and of our Army.

I had not intended to make any comment upon the bill at this time, but I feel that we are proceeding rather by habits of thought than by any clear comprehension of the facts which face us in the world today. Certainly if we are to learn anything from what is transpiring in Europe, it is that the nations of Europe, which were supposed to be militaristic, which were supposed to be well grounded in raising and caring for armies, were utterly behind the times.

The Republic of France, we were taught to believe, had the greatest and most modern army that had ever been raised, and yet it wilted away when it was placed to the test. Great Britain as well as France watched the growth of a modern war machine without doing a thing to prepare themselves to meet the use of that machine. The military leaders of Great Britain, and the military leaders of France, seemed to be utterly oblivious of the fact that a great nation was using the developments of science for the purpose of concentrating military force.

Now we know that airplanes, tanks, and motorcycles offer the instrumentalities that make for conquest. They are the instrumentalities which are needed for defense. It is much more important to our country, it seems to me, that we shall be fully prepared with the most modern, the most effective, and, if need be, the largest air arm that was ever raised in the history of the world, than that we shall have a million or two million men drilling with rifles.

The result of the war that is now in progress over the British Channel will depend not upon the size of the German Army, the men who carry the rifles, nor upon the size of the British force. It will depend upon whether the air force of Great Britain and the navy of Great Britain are strong enough to prevent the invasion.

That, Mr. President, is why I feel that it is of the utmost importance that in preparing the legislation which is now before the Senate we take care to create an opportunity in our Army for mechanics, so that we shall have an army of the modern kind that can be equaled by no other army in the world. That is the reason briefly—while I am in entire sympathy with the objectives which the Senator from Oklahoma desires to achieve—why I hope that he will permit this matter to go over in order that we may be able to give it a little more study.

Mr. MALONEY rose.

Mr. O'MAHONEY. I shall be glad to yield to the Senator from Connecticut.

Mr. MALONEY. Mr. President, in view of the fact that I first made the suggestion that this amendment go over, I should like, in the time of the Senator from Wyoming, to withdraw the suggestion. I have discussed the matter with the Senator from Oklahoma, who is very anxious, first, that his amendment be acted on, and is quite willing that we work on it and perfect it, probably here or else in conference, or in the House, at a little later time.

To me the argument made is persuasive, first, because every Member of the Senate, I am confident, is anxious to see the Army pay increased. I, myself, would go a little further than $30 a month if I had complete freedom. I understand that the administration, and in fact, the Army, are anxious to have the pay increased. For that reason I withdraw my suggestion, confident that the matter can be satisfactorily worked out, and I express the hope that the amendment will now be adopted.

Mr. BONE. Mr. President, I should like to ask the Senator from Oklahoma about one provision of his amendment. I note he refers to the monthly base pay of enlisted men. The term "enlisted men," as I understand, means every man in the Army except commissioned officers. Possibly the Senator from Texas [Mr. SHEPPARD] may be able to answer the question if the Senator from Oklahoma cannot do so. I do not know that it is any deep mystery, or anything of that sort, but would this term, were the amendment to be adopted, include the men who are taken in under the Burke-Wadsworth bill?

Mr. LEE. Yes.

Mr. BONE. Would they also share in the pay that is contemplated by the Senator's amendment?

Mr. LEE. Yes. "Enlisted men" is a term used to contrast with the commissioned officers. All others are enlisted, whether they are inducted or volunteer.

Mr. BONE. The term, then, is used merely to distinguish the rank and file from the commissioned officers of the Army and is sufficiently inclusive to take in the men who are brought in or inducted into the service under the pending bill?

Mr. LEE. Yes. That is the language that is used in all the legislation, and relates to the men other than the commissioned officers.

Mr. O'MAHONEY. Mr. President, with the understanding that the amendment can be perfected, and lest having it go over should be misinterpreted as being in opposition to the principle of the amendment, I shall say no more about it, and shall be very glad to have the amendment acted on.

Mr. PEPPER obtained the floor.

Mr. BARKLEY. Mr. President, will the Senator from Florida permit us to get a vote on this particular amendment? I understand he intends to address the Senate.

Mr. PEPPER. Yes.

Mr. HOLT. I think some other Senators are interested in this amendment. I see no objection to having a quorum call if we are to have action on the amendment.

Mr. PEPPER. I shall be glad to yield for that purpose.

Mr. BARKLEY. I do not object to a quorum call.

Mr. HOLT. I think we should have a quorum call before action is taken on an amendment of this nature.

Mr. BARKLEY. Very well.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from West Virginia suggest the absence of a quorum?

Mr. HOLT. I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The clerk will call the roll.

The legislative clerk called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Eighty-eight Senators have answered to their names. A quorum is present.

Mr. OVERTON. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. PEPPER. I yield.

Mr. OVERTON. I have asked the Senator from Florida to yield to me in order that I may offer an amendment, which I send to the desk and ask to have stated.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. An amendment is pending which has not been disposed of.

The question is on agreeing to the modified amendment offered by the Senator from Oklahoma [Mr. LEE] to the amendment reported by the committee.

The amendment as modified to the amendment was agreed to.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Louisiana offers an amendment, which will be stated.

The CHIEF CLERK. At the end of the committee amendment it is proposed to add the following new section:

SEC. —. (a) The benefits of the Soldiers and Sailors Civil Relief Act, approved March 8, 1918, are hereby extended to all persons inducted into the land or naval forces under this act, and, except as hereinafter provided, the provisions of such act of March 8, 1918, shall be effective for such purposes.

(b) For the purposes of this section—

(1) the following provisions of such act of March 8, 1918, shall be inoperative: Section 100; paragraphs (1), (2), and (5) of section 101; article 4; article 5; paragraph (2) of section 601; and section 603;

(2) the term "persons in military service", when used in such act, shall be deemed to mean persons inducted into the land or naval forces under this act;

(3) the term "period of military service", when used in such act, when applicable with respect to any person, shall be deemed to mean the period beginning with the date on which such person is inducted into such land or naval forces under this act for any period of training and service and ending 60 days after the date on which such period of training and service terminates.

Mr. PEPPER. Mr. President, the Washington Times-Herald of today carries an article on page 2 headed "Pepper quoted as advocating F. D. as dictator." Then there is a subheadline, "Fulton Lewis asserts Senator told him drastic step needed." That article, by Mr. William Strand, purports to give the substance of a radio address made over Station WOL last evening by a gentleman who is a very able radio commentator, a responsible newspaperman, and a very good personal friend of mine.

Today upon the floor of the Senate the very able Senator from Montana [Mr. WHEELER] referred to and read certain excerpts from the address by Mr. Lewis. I came upon the floor at the invitation of the able Senator from Montana to hear a portion of his remarks, and at that time stated that I had never made a practice of referring to or denying statements which might be made in the press with reference to my attitude or conduct, because long ago I found that I could not possibly deny all the things which might be said about me as a figure occupying some small place in the political arena, and that generally when I tried to do so I accentuated the damage rather than diminished it. So a newspaper is not a good opponent with which to get into a controversy.

However, there are times, and there are circumstances, which I think justify a man in public life in desiring that there be no misunderstanding about the facts, in order that thereafter, when some other circumstances may prevail, he may not be confronted with statements which he may be assumed to have admitted by not denying them.

With those words of explanation I ask the indulgence of the Senate for a few moments of comment with respect to that matter.

Two or three persons indicated to me that they had heard that some conversation took place at Chicago during the convention, between the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. WALSH], the Senator from Montana [Mr. WHEELER], and myself, in which one of those Senators suggested that somebody was proposing to make President Roosevelt a dictator, and that I had replied that it was intended only to make him a temporary dictator. In the colloquy which ensued between the able Senator from Montana and myself shortly after lunch the statement was made on the Senator's part that he had made such a statement and that I had made such a reply. The statement was made on my part that I did not make such a statement. Perhaps both of us answered with greater abruptness than we intended. I should like to modify what I said by the statement that I never intended to make such a statement, and I have no recollection or consciousness of having used that language.

Mr. WHEELER. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. PEPPER. I yield to the Senator from Montana.

Mr. WHEELER. Of course, if the Senator says he never made the statement, I do not wish to dispute him and say that he did. However, my recollection is as I stated to the Senator privately. President Roosevelt's name was not mentioned; but, as I recall, we were discussing the powers which the Senator felt the President ought to have, and I said to the Senator, "What you want to do is to set up a dictatorship." As I recall, the Senator said, "Only temporarily." I did not place any importance to the remark because it was made during a casual conversation such as two Senators might have. I might say to some Senator during the course of debate, "What you are trying to do is so-and-so." I did not make the statement with the idea of casting reflections upon the Senator. When the Senator made his speech on the floor of the Senate with reference to his seven points, I think the statement was made that what he was trying to do was to set up a dictatorship.

I do not think that was casting a reflection or was intended to cast a reflection upon the Senator from Florida. If he says to me that he did not make the statement, I would have to say that, in my judgment, my recollection was that the conversation took place; but I do not want to get into a controversy with the Senator about it, because it is not of sufficient importance, one way or the other. When I called attention to the statement this morning, I knew that Fulton Lewis was a friend of the Senator from Florida, and I assumed, knowing Fulton Lewis, that he would not have any particular objection to my quoting it. The way it came about was that the Senator from Ohio [Mr. TAFT] was referring to what this bill would do in the drafting of men and businesses, and I called attention to the statement which had been made.

Mr. PEPPER. I thank the able Senator from Montana for making those remarks. He will recall, and Senators who heard the radio address of Mr. Lewis will recall, that he recited that I did not make the statements attributed to me by the commentator.

Mr. Lewis came to see me in the restaurant, I think, 2 or 3 days ago, and asked me if there was any substance to the report about any such conversation having taken place. I told him there was not; that I had never heard of such a conversation. I certainly have no awareness or recollection of any such conversation ever having taken place. In the platform deliberations I made no comment on any subject except with reference to a plank on foreign affairs, and there was considerable debate on that plank between the able Senator from Montana and me, he rather taking one side and I taking the other side; but I was never aware that there was anything approximating that statement made. I so stated to Mr. Lewis. Then he proceeded to interrogate me about my ideas on subjects related to that matter, that is, the degree to which this country should mobilize its energies, its efforts, and its powers to meet the crisis which it confronts.

I made some comment not dissimilar in character from the comment I have made a number of times upon the floor of the Senate.

Mr. President, in referring to that statement I should like to make a little more complete reference to it.

> The story is that Senator PEPPER replied to that:
> "No; I only want to make the President a temporary dictator."
> Now, after tracing down that much through a dozen different sources there were many things that could have been done next, but the logical and ethical one seemed to be to go to Senator PEPPER in person and ask him whether the story was true or not, which I did for you yesterday afternoon.
> He said he doesn't remember any such incident, although he said he might possibly have made some reference along the line that it is necessary to recognize the difference between a democracy coasting along in peacetimes and a democracy that has its back to the wall in a dire and threatening emergency.
> I asked Senator PEPPER just what his views are regardless of whether he said it or not, whether he does believe that the President should be made a temporary dictator.
> His reply to that was not an unconditional "Yes." In fact, he didn't say yes or no. He said he believes the United States is facing the greatest crisis, the greatest emergency in its entire history, and he believes that if we are serious in wanting to preserve what we have we should give Mr. Roosevelt full and complete wartime powers, whatever the President thinks is necessary to deal with the situation and to pull us through.

Mr. President, the latter part of that statement is not altogether accurate. I did say that I believed we should in this crisis confer upon the President full wartime power. Senators will remember that I made the same statement in offering the seven-point program which I presented in the Senate some little time ago. It will be recalled that title 50, section 80, of the United States Code, Annotated, begins in this way:

> PROCUREMENT OF WAR MATERIAL—MOBILIZATION OF INDUSTRIES
> The President, in time of war or when war is imminent, is empowered through the head of any department of the Government, in addition to the present authorized methods of purchase or procurement, to place an order with any individual, firm, association, company, corporation, or organized manufacturing industry for such product or material as may be required, and which is of the nature and kind usually produced or capable of being produced by such individual, firm, company, association, corporation, or organized manufacturing industry.
> Compliance with all such orders for products or material shall be obligatory on any individual, firm, association, company, corporation, or organized manufacturing industry or the responsible head or heads thereof and shall take precedence over all other orders and contracts theretofore placed with such individual, firm—

And so forth. I believed then, and I believe now, inasmuch as we have lost weeks of time in negotiating with manufacturing concerns about materials, about the purchase price to be paid, perhaps, about the manner in which the contract shall be executed, that in time of pressure, when manpower is subject to call, industrial power should likewise be subject to the Nation's commands; and, if we need airplanes, somebody acting under the authority conferred by the Congress should have the power to say to those capable of making airplanes, "You must make airplanes to defend your country." It is in that sense that I have always regarded the subject of the exercise of such power as that.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. PEPPER. Pardon me a moment. But it will be recalled that at the end of the section from which I read there is a provision guaranteeing fair compensation to the industries that might be required to fill such orders. Of course, I did not contemplate the Government being unfair to anybody or confiscating anybody's property, but I do say that in a great crisis there is not time, as Emerson said, to spend the day in explanation. That is all the Senator from Florida had in mind in making that comment, at least.

I now yield to the Senator from Missouri.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Mr. President, since the Senator is clearing up things he did say and did not say, I should simply like to ask him whether it is true that he said, as was quoted in the public press—and that is my only authority for it—that he advocated a provision of law to authorize the President of the United States to seize such plants as the Ford plant and to compel them to manufacture airplanes for foreign governments?

There is nothing in the statute which the Senator from Florida has read which would ever authorize in time of peace the President of the United States or anybody else to compel an American manufacturer to manufacture implements of war for some foreign power. I should like to know whether the Senator advocates such a provision as that? If he does, it seems to me that there has never been a more extensive assumption of power by Hitler or Mussolini than that.

Mr. PEPPER. With a slight modification, the answer to the Senator's question is "Yes." I wish to be very frank.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Does the Senator mean that he advocates entrusting the power to anybody to compel an American manufacturer to quit the business in which he has habitually engaged and engage in manufacturing munitions of war, whether airplanes or anything else, for any power in a war in which we have proclaimed ourselves neutral? Is that the Senator's proposition?

Mr. PEPPER. Now, Mr. President, the Senator has changed the inquiry a great deal, and I cannot answer that question with a simple yes or no. I will be glad to give an explanation as to what I do believe.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. I do not wish to demand an explanation of the Senator; but will the Senator explain exactly what he did say in that connection? I make the inquiry simply because the Senator is now in the process of explaining what he did say and did not say. Did the Senator say that he advocated a law which would authorize anybody to compel Henry Ford, or other American manufacturers, to manufacture airplanes or other munitions of war for nations engaged in a war in which we are at present neutral, or supposed to be neutral?

Mr. PEPPER. I will be glad to answer the question, and I appreciate the opportunity of doing so. Title 50, section 80, of the United States Code, Annotated, to which I have just referred, gives the United States Government, through its President—and, of course, this power is conferred by Congress and not usurped by the President—to place an order for war materials with any industry in this country that may be reasonably adapted, as the statute says, to producing that kind of material.

Mr. President, I go further than that and say that, if it is determined to be the policy of the United States Government that some other nation should receive some of those materials, pursuant to the conviction this Government has that for it to do so is in defense of America and that policy is approved by the Congress or authorized and determined upon by the President, it is the Government of the United States speaking, and no individual factory owner has a greater privilege to say where his material shall go than a soldier has to say where he shall go when he is ordered by his Commander in Chief to a destination.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Mr. President, if the Senator will permit a further interruption, then the Senator does advocate the proposition of giving the President of the United States authority to step into somebody's plant and say, "I demand that you make shells, that you make airplanes, or that you make tanks, or something else for a foreign nation engaged in a war in which the law of the United States at the present time makes it a neutral?"

Mr. PEPPER. Of course, the Senator adds a tag onto the question by which he assumes that to do that would be illegal. For the time being, let us leave out the question of legality.

I am speaking about whether or not the citizen should be obligated to carry out any such direction on the part of the Government. If the Congress of the country has authorized the President to make such a requirement, and he does make it, it is not up to the manufacturer of the material to say where it shall go, any more than it is up to the manufacturer of a soldier's uniform to say where the soldier who wears that uniform shall go to defend his country.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. PEPPER. I yield.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Is it not a fact that the connection in which the Senator made his remarks which were quoted in the newspaper to which I have referred had to do with the fact that Henry Ford refused to enter into a contract with the British Government—not with the American Government, but with the British Government—to transform his factory into an airplane factory, and Mr. Ford at that time stated, at least he was so quoted in the public press, and the published statement was never denied, that he was willing to make any sacrifice or do anything that was necessary for the defense of the United States, but that he refused to turn his factory into a munitions plant for any nation except the United States of America, and the Senator's statement quoted in the public press had reference to that situation? The Senator denounced Mr. Ford as more or less of a "fifth columnist" and a traitor to his country, and, according to the public press, advocated that laws be passed to enable somebody to go in and take possession of Mr. Ford's factory and make him a purveyor of munitions to a nation engaged in a war to which we are not a party.

Mr. PEPPER. The Senator is not disclosing, in the statement he made, that the comment which the junior Senator from Florida made in the first place was made before the opinion of the Attorney General was announced with respect to the 1917 statute which grew out of the later discussion of the proposed sale of mosquito boats by the Navy. In the second place, the Senator from Florida said, in explanation of his position, that the Government of the United States, and not any individual citizen, manufacturer, or industrialist, should determine the foreign policy of this country, and when the duly constituted Congress and President determine what that foreign policy is it is the duty and the obligation of the citizen to conform to his Government's requirements. That is all I said.

Mr. President, the President of the United States, without any remonstrance of legal significance by Congress, sold or allowed to be sold to Great Britain certain materials. I believe it is the sentiment of a majority of the Congress that if Great Britain survives this onslaught all the things we are doing will not be necessary in the future and that the maintenance of the British defense, the integrity of the British Navy, is, for the time being at least, the best defense there is for the United States of America. If, believing that, the Congress and the President say that if Great Britain can have enough airplanes to protect itself and not be conquered that is going to keep us from being attacked in this hemisphere, and if the Congress gives the President power to place orders with Mr. Ford or anybody else for airplanes to be delivered to Great Britain, and he does it, I simply say that if Mr. Ford did not do it, in the first place, he would not be complying with the law of his country; and, in the second place, he would be attempting to usurp the right to determine the foreign policy of this country, and that prerogative should be preserved for his Government.

Mr. ADAMS. Mr. President——

Mr. PEPPER. I yield to the Senator from Colorado.

Mr. ADAMS. I wish to inquire whether or not the statute which the Senator read, which I did not have a chance to follow closely, did not limit the powers conferred upon the President to wartime; because, of course, there is a vast difference between the powers which Congress can confer and which the President can exercise in wartime and in peacetime. Am I correct in my understanding?

Mr. PEPPER. Mr. President, if the Senator will allow me, the best way to answer that question is to read the first two lines:

First, the caption:

Procurement of war material; mobilization of industries.

That is in capital letters, and then this:

The President, in time of war or when war is imminent, is empowered, through the head of any department—

And so forth.

Mr. BONE. Mr. President, what statute is that?

Mr. PEPPER. Title 50, section 80, of the United States Code, Annotated.

Mr. ADAMS. Then it really involves the war powers in each case. In other words, if it were not for the war powers we should be confronted with certain constitutional limitations.

Mr. PEPPER. Oh, yes.

Mr. ADAMS. In other words, the due-process-of-law clause. The statute does provide for compensation.

Mr. PEPPER. Yes.

Mr. ADAMS. But there is no due process of law, and we must have recourse to the war powers.

Mr. PEPPER. Of course.

Mr. President, as a lawyer I am of the opinion that while it might be possible to construe a situation like the present as one in which war is imminent, using the word "imminent" in the sense of there being a dire possibility, or enough of a possibility, to cause us concern and perhaps preparation of an intense character—I say, while that interpretation might legalistically be possible, yet I think the only proper interpretation would be for the Congress, as the Senator indicated in principle here the other day, to be the agency that would determine that war is imminent or that these powers should be exercised. What I advocated, insofar as what I advocated is important, was that the Congress should confer these powers upon the President by adjudicating that these conditions do exist; at least, that there is enough terrible danger of war for us to mobilize every energy we possess in the defense and the preparation of this country against war.

Mr. WHEELER and Mr. BONE addressed the Chair.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Florida yield; and if so, to whom?

Mr. PEPPER. I think the Senator from Montana rose first. I yield first to him, and then I will yield to the Senator from Washington?

Mr. WHEELER. Mr. President, I thought when the Senator came in, and I was reading what he was quoted in the morning newspapers as saying——

Mr. PEPPER. I am going on to other parts of this.

Mr. WHEELER. I thought, perhaps, the Senator took some offense because I was reading it, but I go back to the speech which he made a short time ago on his seven-point program. He spoke then of giving the President the full wartime powers. He said:

First. Confer upon the President full wartime power to prepare and defend America.

Second. Universal defense service, so that every citizen may be best trained and placed for the country's defense.

I mean by that just what I say: Universal service, enacted as soon as the present Congress can enact it, calling to the colors of their country the men of this Nation—young men, middle-aged men, and older men—every one of them to take his place where his Government may judge that he may best serve—in the Army, in a factory, upon a highway, in building forts or ships, or whatever the defense of this God-blessed country may require.

Third. Confer upon the President power to suspend all rules, regulations, and statutes, including Army, Navy, and departmental seniority regulations, which in his judgment interfere with the maximum speed in the production, transportation, or manufacture of defense materials.

Then he goes on to say:

In addition to that, Mr. President, I have purposely included the power to suspend the wage-hour law, the power to suspend the Walsh-Healey Act, the power to suspend the National Labor Relations Act, the power to suspend any rule, any regulation, any statute which the President thinks, in his wise discretion, will interfere with the vital necessity of this country's arming itself at the earliest possible time that conditions permit.

* * * * * * *

If more hours of work are required of labor, I favor conferring upon the President power to require whatever number of hours the national emergency may necessitate; for although I have tried to defend labor as loyally as I knew how, I say to the labor unions, whose interests I have always supported on this floor, "The only chance you have to have collective bargaining and liberty of economic action is for your country to live and democracy to exist upon the face of the earth."

Then the Senator goes on. So, as a matter of fact, the statement which the Senator made upon the floor is but very little different from what he is quoted as saying to Fulton Lewis.

Mr. PEPPER. Mr. President, I am going to point out that there are only a few inaccuracies and a few instances in which there was a little different interpretation placed upon the language used than was intended, but I expect to show what the relatively few inaccuracies are.

Mr. WHEELER. What I was going to say to the Senator was this: When I was calling attention to what the Senator is quoted as saying to Mr. Lewis, bearing in mind what he had said here on the floor of the Senate, I did not dream that he could in the slightest degree take offense at my calling attention to it.

I can understand how the Senator is in favor of conscription, because his idea is, first, to "confer upon the President full wartime power," and his second proposition was to have "universal defense service, so that every citizen may be best trained and placed for the country's defense."

I say to the Senator that what the Congress is doing, and what Senators are doing when they are voting for this conscription bill, is following step by step exactly what the Senator from Florida has advocated. That is what they are doing. We are now taking the first step in his program. I agree with the Senator that we take the first step in his program when we vote for conscription, and we have taken other steps that the Senator has advocated. He is one of the men in this body—and I say it with all kindness—who has probably been closer to some of the insiders than has almost anybody else in this body.

Mr. CONNALLY. Mr. President, what is an insider? [Laughter.]

Mr. WHEELER. I think we all know without any further explanation.

Mr. CONNALLY. I do not.

Mr. WHEELER. The Senator from Texas is not on the inside. [Laughter.]

Mr. CONNALLY. I know it. I cannot get on the inside unless I know who the insiders are.

Mr. WHEELER. The Senator from Texas could not get in anyway. [Laughter.]

Mr. PEPPER. Mr. President, I appreciate the compliment of the Senator, but I am afraid his reach will exceed his factual grasp when he attributes to me the honor that I am afraid he intended to confer upon me, because the Senator, of course, does not mean that with respect to the President, or the Cabinet officers, or the newspapers here in Washington, or anybody else, for that matter, there are at least three-fourths of the Senators in this Chamber who are as close as I am.

Mr. WHEELER. Oh, no; I do not agree to that at all, because, with all due respect to the Senator, I think he is probably closer to the program that is being put through than anyone else. As a matter of fact, things which have been done up to this time have been in accordance with what the Senator from Florida has advocated. I congratulate the Senator on being able to put through his program so far as he has, and I have no doubt that, if we put through conscription, the next step will be as outlined by the Senator in his seven-point program.

The Senator sincerely believes in the program, and is conscientious about it, and is honest about it, and he believes it is necessary. The difference between the Senator and me is that I do not believe in that kind of a program, and I do not think it is necessary. The Senator does.

The Members of the Senate should be aware of the fact that when they take this first step for conscription they are carrying out another step of the Senator's program which will lead us into conscription of wealth. I think the men who are howling about conscription at the present time, and are in favor of it, should recognize that this is but the first step; that the next step will be the conscription of property, and the next step will be to carry out the rest of the Senator's program, to give the President power—

To suspend the wage-hour law, the power to suspend the Healey-Walsh Act, the power to suspend the National Labor Relations Act, the power to suspend any rule, any regulation, any statute which the President thinks, in his wise discretion, will interfere with the vital necessity of this country's arming itself at the earliest possible time that conditions permit.

I do not know what more power Mr. Hitler has than that; I do not know what more power Mr. Mussolini has than that. I have been pointing out constantly that this was the first step, that the first step would be conscription of men and the next step conscription of wealth.

Let me say in all frankness, and with due regard to the Senator, that the proposals which were made to the committee on resolutions at the Democratic Convention, were in entire accord with the proposals which the Senator from Florida made upon the floor. One of the proposals made was to have every man fitted into his particular niche—farmer, laborer, merchant, everyone else—as a part of our defense program. While conscription was not mentioned, the fact was stated that everyone should be fitted into his particular niche. That suggestion was turned down by the committee on resolutions, first turned down in the subcommittee, I think only one member being in favor of it, all the others being opposed. Then it came into the full committee, and in the full committee there were not to exceed seven or eight votes for it.

We are following, and it was intended we should follow, the program as laid down. So when I say that the Senator is carrying out the program of some of the people on the inside, I have not the slightest doubt that that is true, and I congratulate the Senator for being on the inside, while most of us are not.

Mr. PEPPER. Mr. President, I think perhaps the Senator will agree that at least the length of what he has said was the equal of one question, or a little bit more; and, of course, the Senate and the Senator realize how difficult it is to answer each one of the suggestions made by the Senator. If the Senator from Washington will excuse me for just a few minutes, I know he will understand I would like to make some comment upon these imputations.

Mr. President, I have made it as clear as the English language can be spoken that whatever I did in respect to the international situation I did out of my own sense of what was right and proper for the country, I did it on my own initiative, I was speaking for no one but myself individually, as instanced by the fact that on one occasion I got one vote, and on one other occasion two votes. I think that indicates, perhaps, as the Senator indicated, that I was not speaking for anyone else in the Senate.

Mr. WHEELER. Let me congratulate the Senator, then, if he was speaking for himself only, that the administration followed his suggestion. [Laughter.]

Mr. PEPPER. I wish to say that there is no monopoly on right, and it is very easy for a great many people to hit upon the right course at the same time, and I am only happy that a few of the things I have advocated have been sustained, not altogether by the initiative of any of the other officers of the Government, but have been consummated by the unyielding pressure of public sentiment in the United States. That has been attested by Gallup polls, by newspaper sentiment, expressed in news stories and editorials, and by contacts which Senators have had with their constituents back home.

I say, and I have said all the time, that the people have been ahead of the Congress. I do not intend by that to disparage the Congress, but I think the cold fact is that the people have been more concerned, more upset, more alarmed, and more conscious of the necessity of immediate and drastic action, than has been the Congress of the United States, at least the Senate of the United States. So not even the President, I will say to the Senator from Montana, in whatever he may have done administratively, deserves more than a share of the credit. The real credit for the virtue of whatever may have been done has come from the sentiments which have rolled in from the cities and the towns and the rural districts of this country, because the people thought their Nation and their destiny were insecure.

Let that stand once for all as a direct refutation of either the statement or intimation that in whatever I have done, in the convention at Chicago or here or anywhere else, I have acted other than on my own responsibility as a Senator from a sovereign State of this country.

I will say this further to the Senator, that Woodrow Wilson is to me a political and spiritual prophet. I still worship at the shrine of Woodrow Wilson, and, take it for whatever of obloquy it may entail upon me, if any—and I regard it as an honor—I still feel that the fundamentals of Woodrow Wilson's sentiments were right when they were expressed, and were tragically repudiated when they were defeated. I still say that as a child I used to read Woodrow Wilson's speeches and statements and histories, and as a boy, enlisting in the service for a month and a half or 2 months, I never experienced such elation as I did in the moral uplift which Woodrow Wilson gave to the world. I am proud, even while some now condemn him, to honor the memory of Woodrow Wilson, and say that, more than anything else, what I have known and what I have loved about Woodrow Wilson's principles has been back of whatever feeble contribution I may have made toward the international crisis at this time.

Of course, a critic, cynical about that statement, and wanting to press me to a technical conclusion, would say, "That means, then, that you want to go to war as Woodrow Wilson did, does it?" I would answer that as President Roosevelt, who was a member of his Cabinet, answered, "I learned from Woodrow Wilson some things to do and some things not to do."

I have said, on this floor, that I do not favor a declaration of war. A declaration of war, as I see it, has nothing to do with the matter. I did say here, in a colloquy with the Senator from Montana, a few days ago, and I do reiterate, that if the United States of America permits the only friend we have amongst the first-class powers of the world to collapse under the brutal heel of Hitler and Mussolini militarism, and permits four bloody dictators to be able to throw dice for the distribution of the world and the destiny of mankind, we commit a folly which I do not believe is possible for rational and patriotic men.

If that be denominated war, it is a misinterpretation to call it war. I say that I would interpose enough force on the side of Great Britain to see to it that her conquest is not consummated.

Mr. WHEELER. Mr. President——

Mr. PEPPER. If the Senator will pardon me—I would do that by such slow degrees as I could maintain, and I would exercise discretion and judgment, of course, in the details of what I did.

I would have begun a long time ago doing just what we have been doing and what the Senate has approved—letting Great Britain buy airplanes. I believe the able Senator from Montana was not in favor of that action.

Mr. WHEELER. Oh, yes; I voted for it.

Mr. PEPPER. Then I am mistaken about that. There were some on the floor of the Senate opposing the pending bill who did not approve it. They were conscientious in their position, and no one is questioning the sincerity of anyone else. Some thought that would lead us into war, but it did not, and who knows what Great Britain would have done if she had not gotten as much help as she has been able to get from private industry in this country?

I would not only let them have whatever we could furnish from our private industry but, in addition to that, I would let them have at the present time, from the forces we might dispense with without imperiling the security of this country, whatever number of destroyers are available, if they need them as badly as I hear they do, because I believe that, if we did that, those destroyers would serve a more useful purpose than they could ever otherwise serve in the defense of the United States and the Western Hemisphere.

Mr. President, there is one other thing to which I should like to advert. Every speaker who has commented on what we have done affirmatively to aid the Allies has assumed as a hypothesis, as a premise, that it was in violation of international law. From now on, when Senators make such a statement, I hope they will be good enough to quote from international law authorities who have written since the adoption of the Kellogg Pact, for I venture to believe that the adoption of the Kellogg Pact brought a new principle into international law. Prior to the Kellogg Pact I should say that a nation was either a neutral or a belligerent, but since the adoption of the Kellogg Pact a nation which is a party to that pact surely has an obligation to do something to defend a fellow signatory power to that pact against the unprovoked aggression of another signatory power.

If the other nation, the third power, does nothing but wash its hands, like Pontius Pilate, and say, "We have nothing to do with this controversy," what does the Kellogg Pact mean? I do not mean that the Kellogg Pact imposed an obligation to send armed forces. It did not, as a matter of fact, specify what the signatory powers were obligated to do if there were a violation of its policy by one signatory power against another signatory power, but I do say that, as the Budapest interpretation of the pact of Paris a good many years ago stated, and as in substance the Harvard Research Committee stated a while ago concerning the Kellogg Pact and its signatories, a third signatory power, such as we are, has a perfectly legal right to do whatever it may think reasonable and proper to do in a defensive capacity to stop or ward off or defend against such unprovoked aggression.

If I am walking along the street, and I see one man doing nothing, but about to be viciously attacked by another, it seems to me that I am not a lawless citizen if I even venture to hold my hand up to ward off the blow against the nonresisting man. It seems to me that then I am a peaceful citizen. I am trying to preserve decorum, and law and order in the community. It seems to me that I would be looked upon in a favorable light, not as a lawbreaker, but as a peacemaker.

Everyone knows we are not trying to push Hitler back into Germany. We are not trying to limit him to the occupied area that he has in France. We are not trying to throw his iron heel off the face of Belgium and Holland and the other countries that he has prostituted and endeavored to destroy. We are not trying to do any of those things, but we do say that there is a limit to how much of the world a dictator, in confederation with other dictators, may gobble up without seriously affecting our own physical integrity and security.

Mr. WHEELER. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. PEPPER. I yield.

Mr. WHEELER. The Senator from Florida, I take it, was not a Member of the Senate at the time the Kellogg Pact was adopted. It is my recollection that the argument was made at that time, that if we adopted the Kellogg Pact it would be incumbent upon us to go to the defense of any signatory nation, and it was strenuously argued, as I recall, that there was no obligation of that kind under the Kellogg Pact. If there had been such an obligation under the Kellogg Pact I am sure that the Senate of the United States would never have approved the pact.

Mr. PEPPER. Mr. President, does the Senator from Montana take the position that when a violation of the pact occurs, and one signatory power unprovokedly assaults another power, which is a signatory power, that yet another signatory power shall stand by and wash its hands, like Pilate of old, and say, "I am disinterested in that controversy"?

Mr. WHEELER. If we should take such a position as that with reference to the Kellogg Pact we, of course, would be at war with Japan today. If that were true we would be at war with Germany; we would be at war with nearly every country on the face of the earth.

Mr. PEPPER. Oh, no; that is not true.

Mr. WHEELER. It is if we follow the Senator's argument to its logical conclusion.

Mr. PEPPER. No, indeed, let me answer, because we are the ones who are to determine what measures we shall take.

Mr. WHEELER. If we follow the Senator's argument to a logical conclusion, then if some aggressor attacks another nation it is our duty, under the Kellogg Pact, to attack the aggressor nation and protect the nation that is attacked. We can come to no other conclusion, as I see it. That is the logical conclusion. First of all, I do not subscribe to the idea. I wish to say to the Senator that I am as much interested as he is in having Great Britain win, and my hopes and wishes that Great Britain may win are equal to those of the Senator from Florida, but I do not agree with the Senator that our whole peace and security depend upon Great Britain. If they do, then we surely are in a very difficult position.

We defended our Nation against Great Britain when she was strong and powerful and when we were extremely weak. Great Britain at that time was not defending our country, and our peace and security did not depend upon the strength of some other nation.

I cannot subscribe to the idea that the peace and security of the United States depend upon any other nation in the world. Never before has the position been taken in the United States that we were not strong enough to defend ourselves, nor has the position been taken that our peace and security would depend upon Spain, Great Britain, France, or any other nation—if we were in a desperate situation.

Mr. PEPPER. I should like to be able to finish my remarks, because I do not want to detain the Senate too long. The Senate will recall that the Senate itself passed a bill a short time ago, which is Public Law No. 671, House bill 9822, which provides as follows:

> That the Secretary of the Navy is further authorized, under the general direction of the President, whenever he deems any existing manufacturing plant or facility necessary for the national defense, and whenever he is unable to arrive at an agreement with the owner of any such plant or facility for its use or operation, to take over and operate such plant or facility either by Government personnel or by contract with private firms.

I realize that the House of Representatives has proposed the repeal of that section of the law, but that was adopted by the Senate—not by the junior Senator from Florida. That simply provides the same emergency powers that are conferred upon the President during wartime, or when war is imminent, in title 50, section 80, United States Code Annotated.

There has been so very much talk about what dictatorship means, and about what this thing and that and the other thing tending to dictatorship mean, that I ventured to look up the definition of "dictator" in Webster's Dictionary, and this is what it says:

> Dictator: A magistrate in cases of emergency appointed by the Senate to 6 months' (at most) tenure of absolute authority. He was usually chosen from among those who had held the office of consul. Sulla and Caesar had themselves made dictators for longer periods, Sulla apparently for an indefinite period and Caesar for life. One exercising similar authority in later times, especially in a republic. Hence, one in whom is vested supreme authority in any line; one who rules as dictator; one who prescribes for others authoritatively, as, the dictators of fashion.

That is a dictator. I brought that up, Mr. President, to distinguish once and for all between a power that Congress may confer upon the President to act as its agent, a power which may be altered or revoked at any time by the Congress, and a status such as that occupied by Hitler, Stalin, or Mussolini.

Mr. CONNALLY. Mr. President, will the Senator yield for a question?

Mr. PEPPER. I yield.

Mr. CONNALLY. I notice that a good many other Senators in debate, as well as the Senator from Florida, have used the language, "confer upon the President full wartime power." What kind of power is "full wartime power"?

Mr. PEPPER. What the Senator from Florida had in mind was to enable the President to exercise the powers prescribed in title 50, section 80, of the United States Code, Annotated, part of which I read a moment ago; that is, to acquire war material, and so forth.

Mr. CONNALLY. As I understand, that is already the law.

Mr. PEPPER. I will say to the Senator that according to——

Mr. CONNALLY. I am not arguing with the Senator, but I have heard many Senators talking about "full wartime power." Will the Senator be kind enough to explain that term? The old Supreme Court has held repeatedly—and I think the new Court would also hold—that the Constitution means the same in time of war as it means in time of peace, and that a condition of war does not change any constitutional provision in any way. I remind the Senator of that fact.

Mr. PEPPER. As I explained to the Senate a moment ago, what I had in mind was for the Congress to adjudicate that the situation justifies the President in exercising the powers which are prescribed in title 50, section 80, of the United States Code, Annotated.

Mr. BONE. Mr. President, will the Senator yield for a question?

Mr. PEPPER. Yes; I yield.

Mr. BONE. I think, perhaps, we are all somewhat confused, because we have had this problem catapulted into our laps, and no one has had the opportunity to look at the law. No matter how good a lawyer a Senator may be, his memory is probably treacherous; but, as I recall, the President of the United States had vast powers—perhaps it is the wrong word—but it seems to me he had almost illimitable powers during the World War. Some of those statutes have been repealed. It is my purpose to make some inquiry of the Attorney General to find out what they were.

My reason for rising at this time is this: The able Senator from Florida says that he thinks that in this emergency we should vest the President with full wartime powers. I think we all understand that in the event of a declaration of war, which would, of course, call into being the necessity for the exercise of full wartime powers, we should undoubtedly enact in the Congress of the United States the so-called mobilization plan. That plan was in part embodied in seven bills introduced by the Senator from Missouri [Mr. CLARK] in 1935, for himself and on behalf of the Munitions Committee, in order that the people might understand the scope of the then existent mobilization plan. I ask the Senator from Florida if, as a part of the so-called full wartime powers of the President, he would grant him the powers which are in the proposed legislative draft, which he knows and I know would be enacted if war should come. Would he now, in this emergency, give the President those powers? They would be part of the wartime powers of the President in case war should come.

Mr. PEPPER. Mr. President, of course I cannot go into bills which I do not have before me; and I do not want to go into a lengthy discussion of that question. My point is: Are we concerned about the situation facing this country, or are we not? We have appropriated more than $10,000,000,000 of the people's money, and we have told the country that there is an emergency. We have actually admitted the possibility of a physical assault—at least many of us have—if not upon this Nation, upon this continent, and upon the interests of this Nation in the world.

Mr. President, nothing like this has ever happened, I believe, in the history of the world—certainly not in the history of the United States—when nation after nation has been destroyed by a few willful men with an alacrity and a thoroughness which mankind has never before seen. I think either we ought to be serious about this matter and put everything we have into it, and not quibble about immaterial things, or we should tell the people that we have been seeing ghosts, and that we apologize to them for alarming them.

I am following the hypothesis that there is at least a reasonable possibility that the Western Hemisphere may be attacked by armed forces of a foreign power. I say—and every Senator knows it—that the hostile naval forces which would exist upon the seas of the world with the British Navy out of the way are superior to the naval forces of the United States. When four men—a representative of Japan, Mussolini, Stalin, and Hitler—can sit down around a table and control a majority of the continents of the earth; when they can mobilize ten, fifteen or twenty million men; when they have illimitable resources; when such a possibility encircles us and confronts us like a heinous nightmare, are we to face it with man-like courage and determination, or are we to equivocate, hesitate, be indecisive and divided in counsel, and treat it as though it were some gladiatorial contest going on somewhere, in which we have an interest, but not a very vital concern?

Mr. BONE. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. PEPPER. I yield.

Mr. BONE. The Senator still has not reached my point. Would he now vest the President of the United States with the powers whicn are envisioned in the mobilization plan which is in legislative shape and ready to be introduced? They would be part of the wartime powers of the President. I should like to have the Senator's views on that question, because those seven proposals—there were seven a few years ago—embodied such powers. Would the Senator from Florida give such powers to the President now in this emergency? I think the Senator can be frank with us and tell us whether or not he thinks the President ought to have such powers.

Mr. PEPPER. The embarrassment of the Senator from Florida is that I have not those bills before me, and I do not know the language of the bills. I do not wish to say "yes" to something which might have a significance which I do not contemplate at this moment.

What I mean can perhaps be best illustrated by telling a little story which I heard of an actor in a melodrama, who, at a certain point in the play, when the villain shot at him, was supposed to thrust his hands to his middle and say, "My God! I am shot." One night the villain got drunk and picked up a loaded pistol instead of an empty one, shot at the actor, and the actor started to say, "My God! I am shot," in his usual manner, when he looked down and saw blood flowing out of his abdomen, and he said, "My God, I am shot." [Laughter.]

In my opinion, we do confront a crisis. We need to do something. What we need to do is effectively to prepare to defend ourselves against possible, if not probable, attack. What is necessary is a matter of judgment, discretion, and wisdom to be exercised by the Congress and the President in conjunction one with the other.

Mr. BONE. Mr. President, may I again intrude on the Senator?

Mr. PEPPER. I yield.

Mr. BONE. I ask the question because books and magazine articles have been written about the M-day plans; and I thought every Member of the Senate was apprised of them. For the Senator's benefit, I shall dig them up as they were introduced a few years ago, and refresh the memory of Senators. They are an imminent possibility, and they are to be part of the wartime powers of the President. I did not conceive that I was doing the Senator an injustice.

Mr. PEPPER. I will say that with the Congress in session and able to revoke any power it may bestow at any time, or to alter it as circumstances may require, I am perfectly willing to vest the exercise of such power in the people's President, whether he be Roosevelt, Willkie, or anybody else, until the emergency is over. I assume that the President will not do a foolish thing; and I assume that if he attempted to do a foolish thing Congress would not permit him to do it. If it is a question of making a choice between being afraid that he would not do enough, and afraid that he would do too much to defend America in this emergency, I will take a chance on the abuse of power.

Mr. BONE. Would the Senator want to have vested in the President at the present moment the power to vacate and set aside any law of the United States? That is an illimitable power. The President has some constitutional powers, but such power would absolutely junk the Constitution if he could set aside every law of the country. Assuming that he might use the best judgment, it is a power never before granted any President in the history of the country.

Mr. HATCH. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. PEPPER. I yield.

Mr. HATCH. I assume that when the Senator from Washington says "never before in the history of the country" he means in peacetime.

Mr. BONE. No. I cannot recall any proposal for a legislative grant of power to the President of the United States freely and of his own motion to set aside any statute of the United States. That was my statement. If I am in error, I shall be glad to have the Senator from New Mexico advise me. He is a good lawyer. However, I never dreamed that even in the World War we went that far. I do not believe we did, because it would be a most astounding exercise of power on the part of an Executive to set aside any law.

Mr. HATCH. If the Senator from Florida will further yield to me, I wish to say in explanation that I am not taking any part in this particular controversy, but, as a matter of historical interest, I happen to have some data on my desk which would answer the Senator from Washington, I think, quite emphatically and quite to the contrary of what he has just said. Does the Senator wish to have me read them?

Mr. BONE. I shall be glad to have the Senator do so.

Mr. HATCH. I now read a quotation from Mr. Archibald Dunning, professor of history at Columbia University, in his Essays on the Civil War and Reconstruction, written in 1904, in which he makes this historical reference to the Civil War problems:

> The commander's privilege (in the Civil War) of doing whatever he regarded as likely to weaken the enemy was freely employed as a warrant for congressional action. Both legislature and executive were, on this theory, "above law." Hence, while Congress was endowed with authority to legislate entirely at its discretion, the President was privileged at his discretion to disregard all this legislation. Where such a conclusion was possible, the principle of departmental check and balance was obviously of little significance. Good statesmanship——

Mr. CONNALLY. Mr. President, will the Senator speak a little louder?

Mr. HATCH. I was reading directly to the Senator from Washington, but I shall be glad to take the Senator from Texas into my confidence.

Mr. CONNALLY. As a Senator I claim my right to hear what is taking place. I do not wish to interfere with any private conversation, but I think we ought to hear it.

Mr. HATCH. I continue the quotation:

> Good statesmanship in both executive and legislature preserved the harmony of the two branches till the strain of armed hostilities was relaxed, but no longer. In the work of destruction the President was the real government, and Congress kept in the background; in the work of reconstruction Congress asserted once more its controlling power, and violently put the President into the background.

I now quote from John W. Burgess, dean of the faculty of political science in Columbia University. Discussing the same subject in the Civil Law and the Constitution, he says:

> Congress (in 1861) placed the Government on the war footing, ratified the President's assumption of war powers, and, on the 6th of August, adjourned, leaving the President practically in the position of a military dictator. This was good political science and good public policy. It was also sound constitutionally. In periods of extreme peril to the political life of a nation, individual liberty, federalism in government, and even coordination of government departments must give way temporarily to the principle of executive dictatorship.

I am reading this to the Senator because it comes from a historical work, merely to show what extreme powers are involved, and what may happen, and that the historical reference of the Senator from Washington is quite incorrect.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Mr. President, will the Senator from Florida yield to me for the purpose of asking a question of the Senator from New Mexico?

Mr. PEPPER. Yes.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. It is a fact, is it not, that during the Civil War the President exercised a dictatorship to the extent that he absolutely flouted the Supreme Court of the United States in its attempt to assert the right of the writ of habeas corpus guaranteed by the Constitution of the United States under all circumstances?

Mr. HATCH. May I continue reading this excerpt, if the Senator from Florida is agreeable to having me continue?

Mr. PEPPER. Certainly.

Mr. HATCH (reading):

It is a desperate remedy, a remedy of last resort, but it is one which every complete political system must contain, and under certain proper conditions employ. The two most modern constitutions of federal government, those of the German Empire and of Brazil, make express provision for it. They authorize the executive in periods of extreme public danger to suspend the ordinary law and establish martial law. There is no question that the Constitution of the United States authorizes the Congress and the President, acting together, to do the same thing. The clauses of that instrument which vest in Congress the power to raise armies, provide for calling the militia into the service of the United States for repelling invasion and suppressing insurrection, and to declare war, and in the President the powers of a commander in chief, certainly contain the principle of the dictatorial power of the whole Government, if not of the President alone, and it is altogether gratuitous to concede that the Government of the United States overstepped its constitutional powers, and acted on the principle that necessity knows no law, in preserving the Union by force against dissolution. It overstepped its ordinary limitations, but it had, and has, the constitutional right to do that in periods of extraordinary danger.

Mr. BONE. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. PEPPER. I yield.

Mr. BONE. When I use the term "the war powers of the President" I am merely using the language which the average lawyer would use, meaning the powers granted in the orthodox fashion, by the passage of legislation. I am not talking about either the brutal or the incontinent seizure of power either because of military necessity or because of a man's own inane impulses. In asking the question of the Senator from Florida I was talking about this body, the constitutional lawmaking body of the country, coldly and deliberately and purposefully passing laws. I am not talking about a dictator. It may be that when we get into war—and that is what I fear, and that is what I think we are going into very shortly—the very condition which the Senator from New Mexico has read as described through the pen of a historian might come about. I know that in wartime civil rights are junked, but I also know that our own Supreme Court held that the Constitution was not abrogated during the World War, although we went very far in abridging men's rights.

I was referring to the legislation Congress passes as the lawmaking body of this country, the rules it makes, and the way in which it circumscribes and defines the conduct of public officials, including even the President of the United States—because Congress certainly can define his conduct to some degree outside the constitutional prerogative. It was the wartime powers of the President that I had in mind, and also the powers outlined in this pamphlet, which is in the possession of every Senator, which is called The Industrial Mobilization Plan, Revision of 1939, which was prepared, as I recall, at the request of the Senator from Nevada [Mr. McCARRAN] to inform the Senate of the United States what would happen when war comes.

Here are the rules that are going to be laid down for the 130,000,000 people of the United States. God knows, they are drastic enough! They set up what in my judgment is a virtual dictatorship, and it is done by law. It is not a seizure of power by the President. It is not an assumption of power by a cold, hard, ruthless dictator, another Hitler in America.

It is an act of Congress, if you please. That is what I was talking about; and I hope we shall keep the colloquy here within the limits that we, as lawyers, understand. I am not talking about the necessity for assuming vast and illimitable powers when great battles are being fought, and the life of the Republic is at stake, but rather of the cold, studied legislative purpose of the Congress of the United States as reflected in the statutes. That is why I asked the Senator from Florida if he would reenact and give to the President the powers enunciated in this little document which is called the mobilization plan of the United States; that is all.

I know that in wartime Lincoln exercised vast powers, because he thought, and a great many folks who were well informed thought, that the life of the Republic was at stake, and because a nation has the will to live precisely as an individual has the will to live, and under such circumstances much is to be forgiven; but that is not a deliberate exercise of power by a man by grant of Congress. That is something else entirely.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Mr. President, will the Senator from Florida permit me—and then I will not interrupt the Senator again—to ask another question of the Senator from New Mexico? The Senator from New Mexico has quoted from some more or less obscure historian.

Mr. HATCH. The quotation I have given is from John W. Burgess, dean of the faculty of political science in Columbia University.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Is that the one which cites the German Constitution and the Brazilian Constitution?

Mr. HATCH. Yes; but this was written on the subject of the civil law and the constitution. It was written in 1901. It is an old work.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Be that as it may, Mr. President, I was about to ask the Senator this question: The Weimar Constitution also made provision for suspension of laws and the assumption of dictatorship.

Mr. HATCH. I put all that in the RECORD one day.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Yes; and I was about to ask the Senator what happened to Germany and to the world when, under Chancelor Hitler, that provision of the Weimar Constitution was actually put into effect, and all laws were suspended, and Germany went to government by decree, which, as I understand the seven-point program of the Senator from Florida, is what he is advocating—suspension of all laws on decree of the President. What happened to Germany and the world when they put that provision into effect?

Mr. HATCH. Mr. President, will the Senator yield to me?

Mr. PEPPER. I yield.

Mr. HATCH. In reply to the Senator from Missouri, I only want to finish reading this article. It is very short. I will say that I discussed the very question which he raised one day on the floor of the Senate.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. I am sorry I missed it. I should have liked to hear it.

Mr. HATCH. And I put into the RECORD the provisions of the Weimar Constitution, showing, to my satisfaction, at least, that Hitler's rise to power was perfectly constitutional under the German Constitution; and I think it was.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. If the Senator will permit me, I do not think there is any question about that. There never has been any question about it.

Mr. HATCH. It had been challenged on the floor of the Senate.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. That is the reason why I oppose so bitterly any step leading toward the establishment of a dictatorship in the United States, by constitutional means or unconstitutional means. It is frequently said that the Roman Republic, in times of danger and stress, was in the habit of establishing a dictatorship. That, indeed, is true, and perhaps that worked well for a while; but one sorry day there came a time when a dictator did not turn back his power when the emergency was over, and the Roman Republic was at an end; and I do not wish to see the American Republic go the same way.

Mr. HATCH. Mr. President, will the Senator from Florida further yield?

Mr. PEPPER. I yield.

Mr. HATCH. I merely want to say, in reply to the Senator from Missouri, that I know of no one, and least of all myself, who wants to see any such assumption of power; but I am reading to the Senate the historical words showing what may happen in time of war and what may be done under our onstitution.

Mr. WHEELER and Mr. BONE addressed the Chair.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Florida yield, and, if so, to whom?

Mr. PEPPER. Mr. President, I am going to ask Senators to let me finish my speech.

Mr. HATCH. Mr. President, will the Senator yield to me further?

Mr. PEPPER. I yield.

Mr. HATCH. I ask that I merely be permitted to put into the RECORD the rest of these data, which were prepared by the Legislative Reference Service; and, if Senators are interested, they may read them.

The matter referred to is as follows:

The root of the error in denying this right lies in the claim that the Constitution made the Union. The truth is that the Union made the Constitution, and that the physical and ethical conditions of our territory and population made the Union. The Union was, and is, the Nation, and men did not make the Nation by the resolutions of a convention. Men undertook to interpret the requirements of the Union in political and legal organization, and to give them objective form and authority, but behind all that they did, or could, or can do, was and is the Union, the Nation, whose preservation is the supreme principle back of the Constitution, and the supreme law within the Constitution. Any other view of these relations is unspiritual, is purely arbitrary and mechanical. (Quoted from editorial in the Nation, New York, v. 104, p. 568, May 10, 1917.)

Another thing not to be forgotten is that all these extraordinary powers to be given the President are emergency powers. This means two things. One is that the grant is valid only for the duration of the war. It is not a question of the laws being silent in the midst of arms. The point is, rather, that Congress is asked to make it lawful for the President to do many things while the armed conflict lasts, which it would never think of authorizing him to do in times of peace. It is a gift of power in order to avoid the usurpation of power. Moreover—and this is the second implication of what is being done at Washington—the immense powers placed in the hands of the President he may not find it necessary to use at all. Their mere existence may be sufficient to accomplish the purpose. * * *

It is said—a few Congressmen are saying—that it is dangerous to pass laws enhancing the authority of the President so enormously. Some fear that we shall discover that we have created a dictator. Of course, any grant of power may be abused by any official. But no system of checks and balances, no vigilant legislative oversight, can do away with the necessity of getting officials whom we can trust, and then giving them the tools with which to do their work. There were many critics of Lincoln during the Civil War who called him a usurper and a dictator. It is true that in him the necessities of the war led to reposing a confidence and an authority before that time unparalleled.

John Hay wrote privately of Lincoln as a sort of tycoon, going his own way, seldom holding meetings of the Cabinet, running the Army and Navy and conducting foreign affairs according to his own will. But no one today would speak of Abraham Lincoln as grasping at overweening power for its own sake or to further a personal ambition. His mighty spirit was wrestling with the great work of ending the war; and that once done, he was ready to lay down every scrap of dictatorial power and be again one with the people who were bone of his bone and flesh of his flesh. And all that is sought at present by the administration in Washington is to be full panoplied for every emergency which the war may thrust upon the country. When the emergency is overpast, the armor put on to meet it will be quitely laid away. (Quoted from Hughes, Charles Evans, a former Justice of the United States Supreme Court. War powers under the Constitution. Address before American Bar Association, September 1917, sec. doc. 105, 65th Cong. 1st sess., pp. 8, 9.)

Each of these powers, that of Congress and of the President, is the subject of a distinct grant; each is the complement of the other, and together they furnish the adequate equipment of authority for war. There is no more impressive spectacle than that of the President of the Republic in time of war when, in addition to the other great powers of his office he acts in supreme command of the armed forces of the Nation and conducts its military campaigns. It was under this power that President Lincoln defended the proclamation of emancipation. * * *

It is also to be observed that the power exercised by the President in time of war is greatly augmented outside of his functions as Commander in Chief through legislation of Congress, increasing his administrative authority. War demands the highest degree of efficient organization, and Congress in the nature of things cannot prescribe many important details as it legislates for the purpose of meeting the exigencies of war. Never is adaptation of legislation to practical ends so urgently required, and hence Congress naturally in very large measure confers upon the President the authority to ascertain and determine various states of fact to which legislative measures are addressed. Further, a wide range of provisions relating to the organization and government of the Army and Navy which Congress might enact if it saw fit, it authorizes the President to prescribe. The principles governing the delegation of legislative power are clear, and while they are of the utmost importance when properly applied, they are not such as to make the appropriate exercise of legislative power impracticable. "The legislature cannot delegate its power to make a law, but it can make a law to delegate a power to determine some fact or state of things upon which the law makes, or intends to make, its own action depend. To deny this would be to stop the wheels of government. There are many things upon which wise and useful legislation must depend which cannot be known to the law-making power, and must, therefore, be a subject of inquiry and determination outside of the halls of legislation." (Author's note: See Field v. Clark, 143 U. S. 649, 694.)

"Congress cannot be permitted to abandon to others its proper legislative functions; but in time of war, when legislation must be adapted to many situations of the utmost complexity, which must be dealt with effectively and promptly, there is special need for flexibility and for every resource of practicality; and, of course, whether the limits of permissible delegation are in any case overstepped always remains a judicial question. We thus not only find these great war powers conferred upon the Congress and the President, respectively, but also a vast increase of administrative authority through legislative action springing from the necessities of war." (Quoted from editorial in the New Republic, New York, vol. 13, p. 360, January 26, 1918. Compiler's note: See also editorial in the same publication, February 28, 1918, after the Overman reorganized bill had been introduced [T. F. Kluttz, Jr., March 27, 1918.])

"When Congress proposes plans for reorganizing the war administration, it is only reflecting the opinion of a majority of the American people. Mr. Wilson will be falling into the first grave mistake of his career if he permits his opponents to crowd him into the position of ignoring facts, of resenting criticism, and of rigidly opposing reorganization. That was the mistake which Mr. Asquith made in the spring of 1915, and it cost himself and his country dear."

The President's personal and partisan enemies are making use of the crisis in order to force on him, if possible, a mechanism of war administration which would tend to hamper rather than to help him and his Cabinet and which could only add to the existing confusion. He is justified in opposing this particular bill. But if he fails to recognize the necessity of some measure of reorganization which will make in favor of a more unified war administration and a more vigorous conduct of civil and military preparations, he will be misjudging the needs and opinions of the Nation and failing to meet his own obligation to satisfy them. There is still time and space in which to deliver himself and the country from the deplorable consequence of a fight in the midst of war between the executive and legislative branches of the Government. He can still offer as a substitute for the doubtful plan or reorganization, proposed in the Senate bill, a plan of his own which would be better designed to secure a similar result. If he would only adopt this course, he would not only break the force of the attack of his enemies and enable his friends to continue their undivided support, but he would do away with the most formidable threat which has yet been directed against the war morale of the American Nation.

RIGHT OF THE UNITED STATES TO REQUIRE SERVICE ABROAD BY STATE MILITIA

I. IN THE CONSTITUTIONAL CONVENTION

The only two clauses of the Constitution which would relate to the power of the Executive to order State militia abroad apparently are article I, section 8, clause 15, and article II, section 2, clause 1. A careful search of Max Farrand's Records of the Federal Convention has disclosed no substantial argument on either of these provisions.

The provision of article II, section 2 was first stated by the committee of detail as a part of the second section of the tenth article as follows:

"* * * He (the President) shall be Commander in Chief of the Army and Navy of the United States, and of the militia of the several States * * *."

On August 27, 1787, this provision was amended on motion of Roger Sherman, and without extended debate, by adding the words "when called into the actual service of the United States." The Committee on Style reported the clause in its present form:

"The President shall be Commander in Chief of the Army and Navy, and of the militia of the several States, when called into the actual service of the United States."

II. IN THE SUPREME COURT

The question of the right of a soldier not to be sent out of the country was raised in the Selective Draft Law Cases (245 U. S. 366). Arguments for plaintiff are not set out, but the following paragraph from argument for the United States is suggestive.

"There is not, as asserted, any common-law right of a soldier not to be sent out of the country. The status of a citizen properly drafted and that of one who has voluntarily enlisted are the same. Our armies have served in all parts of the world, and such service has never been regarded as illegal (Fleming v. Page, 9 How. 603, 615). Numerous statutes of the original States provided that the militia might be sent into neighboring States. Compulsory military service is not contrary to the spirit of democratic institutions, for the Constitution implies equitable distribution of the burdens no less than the privileges of citizenship. Whatever the limitations sought to be set upon the Crown, there can be no doubt that power to impress for foreign service resided in Parliament, and was actually exerted." (The discussion of this subject is supported by many references to history.)

The case upheld the World War draft law under the power granted to Congress to "declare war * * * to raise and support armies * * *"; and held that the power under these clauses was not restricted by the provisions of the militia clause ("power * * * to provide for calling forth the militia to execute the laws of the United States, suppress insurrections, and repel invasions.")

In Cox v. Wood (247 U. S. 3) it was argued that, since the draft call was avowedly for the purpose of military duty in a foreign country, it was illegal. The district court refused petition for habeas corpus, stating that "such claim of constitutional immunity [from military service beyond the territorial limits of the United States] rests upon the contentions that no conscription act can be passed except under [the militia clause.]" The case was affirmed on the strength of the selective draft law case. (M. H. Nipe, W. C. Gilbert, December 6, 1937.)

This so-called militia clause reads as follows: "The Congress shall have power. * * * To provide for calling forth the militia to execute laws of the Union, suppress insurrections, and repel invasions; * * *."

An act of 1795 empowering the President to call forth the militia in case of invasion by a foreign nation or an Indian tribe was upheld in Martin v. Mott (12 Wheat. 19) as vesting in the President exclusive authority to decide whether the exigencies contemplated by this clause of the Constitution existed.

Mr. PEPPER. Mr. President, I desire briefly to conclude my remarks. I want to finish reference to this radio address, and then I shall shortly have finished.

Senator PEPPER said that if democracy is to survive in this country, against dictatorship in Europe, it is necessary for us to have a set-up with a head that has sufficient power to cope with dictatorship, on equal terms.

Mr. President, if that language were properly understood upon a proper background, I would have no objection to it, and the substance of what is intended to be said there I heartily subscribe to; but of course I am referring only to the ability of the Government to act effectively in a period of emergency through its duly constituted officials; that is all. I am not at all contemplating or condoning the Executive having power equal to the dictatorship which he proposes to oppose. I simply want the government of a democracy, as the able Senator from Washington [Mr. BONE] said a moment ago, to have the will to live, and to be able to survive when attacked by that kind of a danger.

Continuing the article:

I asked whether that means that this country would have to give the President the same degree of totalitarian authority that Mr. Hitler has * * * and once again, Senator PEPPER answered provisionally. He said he feels it should be power that is given to the President by Congress, for the duration of the present emergency only.

So I want it definitely understood that I have never advocated any power in the Executive which is not conferred upon him either by the Constitution or by the Congress.

In a conference this afternoon I called Mr. Lewis' attention to the fact that he omitted to make it clear, as I intended it to be, that I contemplated the Congress remaining in session, as the able Senator from California and others have indicated, so that if there should ever arise any question as to whether executive policy was contrary to legislative authority or purpose, the Congress would be here to act in its constitutional authority.

Mr. WHEELER. Mr. President, I think on page 4 he did say that.

Mr. PEPPER. I will explain the distinction. I continue to quote:

The natural question, then, was, Who is to decide when the emergency is over? And his reply to that was, Congress shall decide.

Which, I think, is perfectly proper, that the Congress should decide when the emergency begins and when the emergency ends. That is a congressional prerogative, and I am sure that every Senator on the floor subscribes to that. I continue the quotation:

He said Congress should come back into session at intervals—and it should have the power to end the emergency or to revoke any part of the President's powers at any time.

I reminded Mr. Lewis this afternoon that he gave the impression there that I contemplated the adjournment of Congress and perhaps its being recalled, and when I reminded him of it he was not disposed to deny that I had said that Congress must remain in session, although, of course, it may recess for a few days at a time if it desires; but the question of its return must be in the discretion of the Congress, and not in the discretion of the Executive.

I continue the quotation:

I asked whether that would mean that elections in November would be suspended—not held. He said no—

I depart from the quotation. Of course not. There is no one in the United States, I believe, who would make such a preposterous proposal as that.

I continue the quotation—

not under any circumstances * * * the elections, he said, should go on. And if Mr. Wendell Willkie wins, Senator PEPPER thinks that these same powers should be continued for Mr. Willkie. He said that he is talking about the President of the United States, not about Mr. Roosevelt the man.

Mr. BONE. From what are these quotations taken?

Mr. PEPPER. This is from a radio address made by Mr. Fulton Lewis last night.

What he wants is one man who has the power to take over the reins of government and direct our defense with complete authority—whether it's the President, or a director of national security, or whatever you may call it.

Mr. President, that is an inaccuracy of a very considerable sort. It is an unintentional inaccuracy on the part of my friend, Mr. Lewis, but I never contemplated any such power as that in the President of the United States, and I remind my colleagues that I never contemplated him having any power except what the Constitution confers upon him and what the Congress confers upon him, which may be altered or rescinded at the will of the Congress of the United States.

I continue the quotation:

He said he merely mentioned President Roosevelt because he believes there is no person in the country as well fitted to do the job as Mr. Roosevelt is.

The mention of Mr. Roosevelt there is an inaccuracy. I said there is no other official of the Government as amply fitted by authority and experience and position to exercise such power, as the agent of the Congress, as the President of the United States. I mean the one who occupies the position of President. I was saying that Congress cannot, as large as it is numerically, act as an entity in administrative affairs, and therefore that the Congress from time to time would, of course, have to delegate powers to the Executive, and I thought, of course, the President was the Executive who should exercise such powers, although we frequently confer powers upon administrative boards or commissions, or upon other individuals.

The quotation continues:

I asked, then, how far he thinks this temporary power for the President should go—and he said it should go as far as necessary for the President to defend the United States.

Subject to what I stated previously about the Congress having first delegated power and being in session at that time with power to order or rescind, I redeclare that principle, because the defense of the United States is the biggest thing there is confronting us all.

The quotation continues:

He said Congress should outline certain general, broad objectives. "It should tell the President," he said, "We want an army that is capable of defending the United States"—and from there on, it should be up to the President to decide how large that army should be—how the men should be selected—his job would be to just get it.

Mr. President, I never consciously made a statement which, in my opinion, could justifiably be said to carry that intent and import. I had in mind the exercise of a power which the President already has, that is, to call up as many forces as he, as Commander in Chief, might think proper within the authority that has been conferred upon him by the Congress. He has that power now. I had in mind the Congress saying just what it is proposing to do by the draft bill, to allow the executive department to call out of the number authorized the number for whom they have equipment and can accommodate in training stations, and that is all.

Senator PEPPER said the President should have, in his opinion, authority to take over all private industry and all private enterprise and all private endeavor, or any part of it, any of it that has any connection with national defense.

Mr. President, departing from the quotation, when that is first read it tends to give the impression that the Senator from Florida was talking about enterprises unrelated intimately to national defense. Of course, I never contemplated any such thing as that. I merely say what I now believe—that those phases of our industry which are intimately a part of the national defense should be available to prosecute the national defense in response to requirements of the Congress and the President of the United States.

I continue the quotation:

I asked whether as a matter of practical fact that wouldn't include almost everything in the country—almost all business and industry—and Senator PEPPER conceded quite frankly, "Yes; it would."

That is an inaccuracy, too, on the part of my friend. On the contrary, the industries which are intimately a part of the defense efforts are a relatively minor part of the industries of this country, and the contrary of what is stated there is true.

Senator PEPPER said he sees no reason why—if Mr. William S. Knudsen and Mr. Ed Stettinius are willing to come to Washington, to direct the National Defense Commission and give their services at a dollar a year—why some other industrial leader should be drawing $2,000,000 a year in salary or profits.

I repeat that statement, that a man who can serve in one capacity that is needed for his country's defense should be as subject to command as a boy who has to leave his home, either by patriotically volunteering, or by draft, and put on the uniform of his country.

The quotation continues:

And he said, with particular emphasis, that he sees no reason why Mr. Henry Ford should be allowed to produce what Mr. Henry Ford wants to produce.

Mr. President, I will not answer that, because I replied to it a while ago in my exchange of comment with the able Senator from Missouri. I do not think the RECORD need be replete with a repetition of the statement I made before.

Of course, the Senator from Florida on the floor, in every comment he made on the subject, meant that Mr. Ford's factory, like every other factory that was needed for the national defense, should be at the command of his Government for the defense of his country; and I believe no one, upon reflection, would subscribe to a contrary doctrine.

The quotation continues:

I asked him about conscription of labor—whether the President should have the power to draft whatever men he wants, not only for the military service of the Army but also for work—and Senator PEPPER said he believes the President should have that power. He said there is no reason why soldiers should draw $21 a month, while the worker in some factory is drawing $20 a day.

Mr. President, the first part of that is an inaccuracy. I never contemplated that the President or the Congress should conscript labor in any case if ever it did it at all, to participate in industry not vitally a part of the emergency defense and preparation program. I did say that the time has passed when men will go in a uniform to the trenches at $30 a month and others be privileged to work in a shipyard, equally vital, at $20 a day, or make munitions in a swivel chair at $25,000 a year.

Mr. WHEELER. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. MINTON in the chair). Does the Senator from Florida yield to the Senator from Montana?

Mr. PEPPER. I yield.

Mr. WHEELER. In a speech in the Senate the Senator said:

If more hours of work are required of labor, I favor conferring upon the President power to require whatever number of hours the national emergency may necessitate; for though I have tried to defend labor as loyally as I knew how, I say to the labor unions, whose interests I have always supported on this floor, "The only chance you have to have collective bargaining and liberty of economic action is for your country to live and democracy to exist upon the face of the earth."

Again, he said:

In addition to that, Mr. President, I have purposely included the power to suspend the wage-hour law, the power to suspend the Healey-Walsh Act, the power to suspend the National Labor Relations Act, the power to suspend any rule, any regulation, any statute which the President thinks, in his wise discretion, will interfere with the vital necessity of this country's arming itself at the earliest possible time that conditions permit.

It seems to me that goes as far as the statement the Senator has read.

Mr. PEPPER. Mr. President, in the speech I made at the time I announced the so-called seven-point program, I think I pretty well indicated what I had in mind. I have heard it said that France was not able to prepare itself while it was working its employees on a 40-hour-week basis while Germany was working its employees on a 60-hour-week basis.

Mr. President, I believe my record in defense of labor during the time I have been in the Senate has been as good as that of any other Senator. But if we needed men to work 50 hours a week or 60 hours a week to manufacture the munitions necessary to defend their homes and their country, I do not think it would be necessary, as a matter of fact, to abrogate this law by Executive or legislative authority, for I know how patriotic the labor of America is.

What I had in mind was that if we are going to defend our country we will do whatever is necessary to defend it. A soldier often works more than 8 hours a day. He has in the regular routine of things, of course, moments of recreation, and hours of work, and hours of leisure. He should have them. I want labor to have a shorter week than a 40-hour week, and a shorter day than the 8-hour day; but if a flood were about to engulf the city of New Orleans, for example, and men were working on the levee above the city, there would not be one of them thinking about the wage and hour law or about the usual restrictions applicable to peacetime endeavor.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. PEPPER. If it is a brief question.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. It will be a very brief question.

Mr. PEPPER. I yield.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. What is it in Fulton Lewis' broadcast that the Senator objects to that is not covered in his seven-point speech?

Mr. PEPPER. Mr. President, if I failed to indicate that to the Senator from Missouri I am very sorry.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. I listened very attentively and I certainly cannot make it out.

Mr. PEPPER. Very well. The chief thing in this particular subject that I am differentiating is that I never uttered or suggested anything that contemplated the taking over of labor, and letting the President determine where it should work, and the amount of wages it should receive, and under what conditions it should work. I have never said that or thought it. No other Senator has ever said it on the floor of the Senate.

No other Senator has ever contemplated such an idea. Yet that is, unfortunately, the impression my friend Lewis leaves in the paragraph I have just quoted.

I said, and I reiterate, that men should be subject to command to do essential war work if it be the policy of the Government to require it, because if one man lives in house A, and beside him a man lives in house B, and they are both called by a draft board, and the man in house A is sent to the trenches, or to camp in a uniform, and the man in house B is set to some kind of war work, it is not fair, it seems to me that one of them should receive $30 a month and perhaps the other one $20 a day.

That is not the ordinary right of labor to have a fair opportunity to work for a fair wage. If Senators want to distort what I have said into some unfriendliness to labor, I leave my comment to the fairness of labor's representatives and to the record that I have humbly tried to make in labor's defense since I have been in the Senate.

Perhaps the essential difference between some other Senators and me is that I am talking about vital, determined, conscientious concern for the defense of America and not about an attitude which implies that Hitler is on the other side of the world and totally disinterested in what we are doing.

Naturally, violently as I differ on that question with some Senators who have propounded questions to me, there would, of course, be a difference in the interpretation we should put upon the questions involved.

Mr. WHEELER. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. PEPPER. If it is a brief question.

Mr. WHEELER. I should like to make this comment. I think there is no man in the Senate whose record has been more favorable to labor than that of the Senator from Florida. That is the reason I was surprised at this particular statement he made in the speech.

Mr. President, I am one of those who want to pay the Senator from Florida the tribute, in fairness to him, that he is entitled to, that no man has stood firmer in working for labor than has the Senator from Florida.

Mr. PEPPER. I very much appreciate that comment from my friend; and I will say this: I hope I am wrong about everything I have said and everything I think about the danger threatening us. I hope no prophecy I have made, no premonitions I have ever experienced will come horribly true. I hope that all of them may be regarded hereafter as Don Quixote jousting at windmills.

I shall be grateful to Almighty God if events shall happily conspire to relieve our country from that horrible thing which I fear hangs like the sword of Damocles over every Senator and every man, woman, and child in the country we love.

There is one short paragraph remaining:

> I asked whether that means that the President would have the power to tell all of the workers—all of the employees in factories and plants all over the country—that they shall go to work at this place, at such-and-such a wage—or over here at some other wage, regardless of what they were getting as private employees, and he said, "Yes; he believes the President should have the power to do that."

Mr. President, as highly as I regard my friend, I certainly never said, or never even intended to say anything that even approximated that statement. So I shall simply hope that my friend, when he has an opportunity to do so, will give to the wide audience which he has addressed, something of my explanation of these comments. In a running conversation between two men, lasting over a protracted period, it is only natural that every word not being definitely used and placed in a manuscript should not be recalled by either party with exactness.

I will say that Mr. Lewis told me this afternoon that he did not use in his address the inflections and the emphasis that would allow some of the interpretations that one might be able to twist from the language used here, if disposed to do so, and that he delivered it in such a manner that he did not consider that he was giving the impression that the Senator from Florida or any other Senator on this floor, regardless of his sentiments about any subject, contemplated in this land of freedom the setting up of any man as a dictator over a free people.

Mr. President, I believe I would go as quickly as any other Senator in this Chamber to unhorse and destroy any man who ever prostituted the power of the people's representative to usurp a dictator's vicious role. But, as Great Britain, which does not love dictators, has found it necessary in an emergency to confer great powers upon its government, amenable always to its Parliament, so I believe that here, if we duly appreciate the necessities of the crisis, we will not quibble over what authority and what power we are giving. We will pray that we have not waited until it is too late to use our greatest powers to prepare and defend our country.

Mr. CONNALLY. Mr. President, I will detain the Senate for only a moment. It is not my purpose to take part in the discussion between the Senator from Florida and the Senator from Montana, but with relation to the general question of giving anybody, the President or anybody else, so-called full wartime powers and things of that kind, I wish to remind the Senate that the Constitution means the same thing in time of war that it means in time of peace.

Senators are familiar, no doubt, and yet it is well to have them reminded of the case of Ex parte Milligan, in which the Supreme Court of the United States overruled the action of Mr. Lincoln.

Mr. BONE. I suggest that the Senator put the case in the RECORD.

Mr. CONNALLY. First, I wish to comment briefly. It is true that Mr. Lincoln, in the War between the States, exercised very wide powers, but some of those powers were exercised unconstitutionally because he had the military power back of him. I am not criticizing Mr. Lincoln. No doubt he thought he had the power to do it; but the Supreme Court held that he did not have the power to do it.

The case of Ex parte Milligan relates to a man by the name of Milligan who was a resident of the State of Indiana. He was a so-called Copperhead. He was not in sympathy with the position of the Union, and he was troublesome, so Mr. Lincoln had him arrested by the military commander of the district of Indiana and haled before a military court. He was tried by court martial and sentenced to hang. Finally, after the war was over, Milligan, being still alive but still in jail, was able to obtain a writ of habeas corpus to the circuit court of Indiana, and on appeal he brought his case to the Supreme Court of the United States. He came into that Court, as it were, with a rope around his neck, but he went out a free man. The case was remanded to the civil courts of Indiana.

I wish to read one paragraph of the opinion. The opinion was written by Mr. Justice David Davis, appointed to the Supreme Court by Mr. Lincoln himself. David Davis was a lawyer in Illinois, and he and Lincoln rode the circuit together. They were personal, intimate friends, and Lincoln put him on the Supreme Court; but in a case affecting the exercise of power by Mr. Lincoln, Mr. Justice Davis ruled against Mr. Lincoln. Later I shall ask leave to have the entire opinion printed in the RECORD; but at this point I wish to read these words of Mr. Justice Davis, which ring like a bugle call:

> The Constitution of the United States is a law for rulers and people, equally in war and in peace, and covers with the shield of its protection all classes of men, at all times, and under all circumstances. No doctrine, involving more pernicious consequences, was ever invented by the wit of man than that any of its provisions can be suspended during any of the great exigencies of government. Such a doctrine leads directly to anarchy or despotism, but the theory of necessity on which it is based is false; for the Government within the Constitution, has all the powers granted to it, which are necessary to preserve its existence; as has been happily proved by the result of the great effort to throw off its just authority.

In fairness, I think I ought to say that while that was the decision of the Supreme Court, there was a dissenting opinion. When I ask to have the opinion printed, I think in fairness I should ask to have the dissenting opinion printed along with it; so I ask leave that the opinions in the case of Ex parte Milligan may be printed in the RECORD at this point. I confine the request to the opinions, because there are long statements of fact, arguments, and briefs of the lawyers which are not important at this time.

I ask unanimous consent that the opinion of the Court and the dissenting opinion may be printed in the RECORD at this point.

There being no objection, the opinions were ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

> At the close of the last term the Chief Justice announced the order of the Court in this and in two other similar cases (those of Bowles and Horsey) as follows:
> 1. That on the facts stated in said petition and exhibits a writ of habeas corpus ought to be issued, according to the prayer of the said petitioner.
> 2. That on the facts stated in the said petition and exhibits the said Milligan ought to be discharged from custody as in said petition is prayed, according to the act of Congress passed March 3, 1863, entitled, "An act relating to habeas corpus and regulating judicial proceedings in certain cases."
> 3. That on the facts stated in said petition and exhibits, the military commission mentioned therein had no jurisdiction legally to try and sentence said Milligan in the manner and form as in said petition and exhibits are stated.
> At the opening of the present term, opinions were delivered.
> Mr. Justice Davis delivered the opinion of the Court.
> On the 10th day of May 1865 Lambdin P. Milligan presented a petition of the Circuit Court of the United States for the District of Indiana, to be discharged from an alleged unlawful imprisonment. The case made by the petition is this: Milligan is a citizen of the United States; has lived for 20 years in Indiana; and, at the time of the grievances complained of, was not, and never had been in the military or naval service of the United States. On the 5th day of October 1864, while at home, he was arrested by order of Gen. Alvin P. Hovey, commanding the military district of Indiana; and has ever since been kept in close confinement.

On the 21st day of October 1864 he was brought before a military commission, convened at Indianapolis, by order of General Hovey, tried on certain charges and specifications; found guilty, and sentenced to be hanged; and the sentence ordered to be executed on Friday, the 19th day of May 1865.

On the 2d day of January 1865, after the proceedings of the military commission were at an end, the Circuit Court of the United States for Indiana met at Indianapolis and empaneled a grand jury, who were charged to inquire whether the laws of the United States had been violated; and, if so, to make presentments. The court adjourned on the 27th day of January, having, prior thereto, discharged from further service the grand jury, who did not find any bill of indictment or make any presentment against Milligan for any offense whatever; and, in fact, since his imprisonment, no bill of indictment has been found or presentment made against him by any grand jury of the United States.

Milligan insists that said military commission had no jurisdiction to try him upon the charges preferred, or upon any charges whatever; because he was a citizen of the United States and the State of Indiana, and had not been, since the commencement of the late Rebellion, a resident of any of the States whose citizens were arrayed against the Government, and that the right of trial by jury was guaranteed to him by the Constitution of the United States.

The prayer of the petition was that under the act of Congress approved March 3, 1863, entitled "An act relating to habeas corpus and regulating judicial proceedings in certain cases," he may be brought before the court, and either turned over to the proper civil tribunal to be proceeded against according to the law of the land or discharged from custody altogether.

With the petition were filed the order for the commission, the charges and specifications, the findings of the court, with the order of the War Department reciting that the sentence was approved by the President of the United States, and directing that it be carried into execution without delay. The petition was presented and filed in open court by the counsel for Milligan; at the same time the district attorney of the United States for Indiana appeared and, by the agreement of counsel, the application was submitted to the court. The opinions of the judges of the circuit court were opposed on three questions, which are certified to the Supreme Court:

1. "On the facts stated in said petition and exhibits, ought a writ of habeas corpus to be issued?"

2. "On the facts stated in said petition and exhibits, ought the said Lambdin P. Milligan to be discharged from custody as in said petition prayed?"

3. "Whether, upon the facts stated in said petition and exhibits, the military commission mentioned therein had jurisdiction legally to try and sentence said Milligan in manner and form as in said petition and exhibits is stated?"

The importance of the main question presented by this record cannot be overstated, for it involves the very framework of the Government and the fundamental principles of American liberty.

During the late wicked rebellion, the temper of the times did not allow that calmness in deliberation and discussion so necessary to a correct conclusion of a purely judicial question. Then, considerations of safety were mingled with the exercise of power and feelings and interests prevailed which are happily terminated. Now that the public safety is assured, this question, as well as all others, can be discussed and decided without passion or the admixture of any element not required to form a legal judgment. We approach the investigation of this case fully sensible of the magnitude of the inquiry and the necessity of full and cautious deliberation.

But we are met with a preliminary objection. It is insisted that the circuit court of Indiana had no authority to certify these questions, and that we are without jurisdiction to hear and determine them.

The sixth section of the "Act to amend the judicial system of the United States," approved April 29, 1802, declares "that whenever any question shall occur before a circuit court upon which the opinions of the judges shall be opposed, the point upon which the disagreement shall happen, shall, during the same term, upon the request of either party, or their counsel, be stated under the direction of the judges and certified under the seal of the court to the Supreme Court at their next session to be held thereafter; and shall by the said Court be finally decided; and the decision of the Supreme Court and their order in the premises shall be remitted to the circuit court, and be there entered of record, and shall have effect according to the nature of the said judgment and order: Provided, That nothing herein contained shall prevent the cause from proceeding, if, in the opinion of the court, further proceedings can be had without prejudice to the merits."

It is under this provision of law that a circuit court has authority to certify any question to the Supreme Court for adjudication. The inquiry, therefore, is whether the case of Milligan is brought within its terms.

It was admitted at the bar that the circuit court had jurisdiction to entertain the application for the writ of habeas corpus and to hear and determine it; and it could not be denied; for the power is expressly given in the fourteenth section of the Judiciary Act of 1789, as well as in the later act of 1863. Chief Justice Marshall, in Bollman's case,[1] construed this branch of the Judiciary Act to authorize the courts, as well as the judges, to issue the writ for the purpose of inquiring into the cause of the commitment; and this construction has never been departed from. But, it is maintained with earnestness and ability, that a certificate of division of opinion can occur only in a cause; and that the proceedings by a party, moving for a writ of habeas corpus, does not become a cause until after the writ has been issued and a return made.

Independently of the provisions of the act of Congress of March 3, 1863, relating to habeas corpus, on which the petitioner bases his claim for relief, and which we will presently consider, can this position be sustained?

It is true, that it is usual for a court, on application for a writ of habeas corpus, to issue the writ, and, on the return, to dispose of the case; but the court can elect to waive the issuing of the writ and consider whether, upon the facts presented in the petition, the prisoner, if brought before it, could be discharged. One of the very points on which the case of Tobias Watkins, reported in 3 Peters,[2] turned, was, whether, if the writ was issued, the petitioner would be remanded upon the case which he had made.

The Chief Justice, in delivering the opinion of the Court, said: "The cause of imprisonment is shown as fully by the petitioner as it could appear on the return of the writ; consequently the writ ought not to be awarded if the court is satisfied that the prisoner would be remanded to prison."

The judges of the circuit court of Indiana were, therefore, warranted by an express decision of this court in refusing the writ, if satisfied that the prisoner, on his own showing, was rightfully detained.

But, it is contended, if they differed about the lawfulness of the imprisonment, and could render no judgment, the prisoner is remediless; and cannot have the disputed question certified under the act of 1802. His remedy is complete by writ of error or appeal, if the court renders a final judgment refusing to discharge him; but if he should be so unfortunate as to be placed in the predicament of having the court divided on the question whether he should live or die, he is hopeless and without remedy. He wishes the vital question settled, not by a single judge at his chambers, but by the highest tribunal known to the Constitution; and yet the privilege is denied him; because the circuit court consists of two judges instead of one.

Such a result was not in the contemplation of the legislature of 1802; and the language used by it cannot be construed to mean any such thing. The clause under consideration was introduced to further the ends of justice, by obtaining a speedy settlement of important questions where the judges might be opposed in opinion.

The act of 1802 so changed the judicial system that the circuit court, instead of three, was composed of two judges; and, without this provision or a kindred one, if the judges differed, the difference would remain, the question be unsettled, and justice denied. The decisions of this court upon the provisions of this section have been numerous. In United States v. Daniel,[3] the court, in holding that a division of the judges on a motion for a new trial could not be certified, says: "That the question must be one which arises in a cause depending before the court relative to a proceeding belonging to the cause." Testing Milligan's case by this rule of law, is it not apparent that it is rightfully here; and that we are compelled to answer the questions on which the judges below were opposed in opinion? If, in the sense of the law, the proceeding for the writ of habeas corpus was the cause of the party applying for it, then it is evident that the cause was pending before the court, and that the questions certified arose out of it, belonged to it, and were matters of right and not of discretion.

But it is argued that the proceeding does not ripen into a cause until there are two parties to it.

This we deny. It was the cause of Milligan when the petition was presented to the circuit court. It would have been the cause of both parties if the court had issued the writ and brought those who held Milligan in custody before it. Webster defines the word "cause" thus: "A suit or action in court; any legal process which a party institutes to obtain his demand, or by which he seeks his right or supposed right"—and he says, "this is a legal, scriptural, and popular use of the word, coinciding nearly with case, from cado, and action, from ago, to urge and drive."

In any legal sense, action, suit, and cause are convertible terms. Milligan supposed he had a right to test the validity of his trial and sentence; and the proceeding which he set in operation for that purpose was his "cause" or "suit." It was the only one by which he could recover his liberty. He was powerless to do more; he could neither instruct the judges nor control their action, and should not suffer, because, without fault of his, they were unable to render a judgment. But the true meaning to the term "suit" has been given by this court. One of the questions in Weston v. City Council of Charleston,[4] was, whether a writ of prohibition was a suit; and Chief Justice Marshall says: "The term is certainly a comprehensive one, and is understood to apply to any proceeding in a court of justice by which an individual pursues that remedy which the law affords him." Certainly, Milligan pursued the only remedy which the law afforded him.

Again, in Cohens v. Virginia,[5] he says: "In law language a suit is the prosecution of some demand in a court of justice." Also, "To commence a suit is to demand something by the institution of process in a court of justice; and to prosecute the suit is to continue that demand." When Milligan demanded his release by the proceeding relating to habeas corpus, he commenced a suit; and he has since prosecuted it in all the ways known to the law. One of the questions in Holmes v. Jennison et al.[6] was whether, under the twenty-fifth section of the Judiciary Act, a proceeding for a writ of habeas corpus was a "suit." Chief Justice Taney held that, "if a party is unlawfully imprisoned, the writ of habeas corpus is his appropriate legal remedy. It is his suit in court to recover his liberty." There was much diversity of opinion on another ground of jurisdiction; but that, in the sense of the twenty-fifth section of the Judiciary Act, the proceeding by habeas corpus was a suit, was not controverted by any except Baldwin, Justice, and he thought that "suit" and "cause" as used in the section, mean the same thing.

The courts do not say that a return must be made and the parties appear and begin to try the case before it is a suit. When the petition is filed and the writ prayed for, it is a suit—the suit of the party making the application. If it is a suit under the twenty-fifth section of the Judiciary Act when the proceedings are begun, it is, by all the analogies of the law, equally a suit under the sixth section of the act of 1802.

But it is argued that there must be two parties to the suit, because the point is to be stated upon the request of "either party or their counsel."

Such a literal and technical construction would defeat the very purpose the legislature had in view, which was to enable any party to bring the case here, when the point in controversy was a matter of right and not of discretion; and the words "either party," in order to prevent a failure of justice, must be construed as words of enlargement, and not of restriction. Although this case is here ex parte, it was not considered by the court below without notice having been given to the party supposed to have an interest in the detention of the prisoner. The statements of the record show that this is not only a fair, but conclusive inference. When the counsel for Milligan presented to the court the petition for the writ of habeas corpus, Mr. Hanna, the District Attorney for Indiana, also appeared; and, by agreement, the application was submitted to the court, who took the case under advisement, and on the next day announced their inability to agree, and made the certificate. It is clear that Mr. Hanna did not represent the petitioner, and why is his appearance entered? It admits of no other solution than this—that he was informed of the application, and appeared on behalf of the Government to contest it. The Government was the prosecutor of Milligan, who claimed that his imprisonment was illegal; and scught, in the only way he could, to recover his liberty. The case was a grave one; and the court, unquestionably, directed that the law officer of the Government should be informed of it. He very properly appeared, and, as the facts were uncontroverted and the difficulty was in the application of the law, there was no useful purpose to be obtained in issuing the writ. The cause was, therefore, submitted to the court for their consideration and determination.

But Milligan claimed his discharge from custody by virtue of the act of Congress "relating to habeas corpus, and regulating judicial proceedings in certain cases," approved March 3, 1863. Did that act confer jurisdiction on the Circuit Court of Indiana to hear this case?

In interpreting a law, the motives which must have operated with the legislature in passing it are proper to be considered. This law was passed in a time of great national peril, when our heritage of free government was in danger. An armed rebellion against the national authority, of greater proportions than history affords an example of, was raging; and the public safety required that the privilege of the writ of habeas corpus should be suspended. The President had practically suspended it, and detained suspected persons in custody without trial; but his authority to do this was questioned. It was claimed that Congress alone could exercise this power; and that the legislature, and not the President, should judge of the political considerations on which the right to suspend it rested. The privilege of this great writ had never before been withheld from the citizens; and as the exigence of the times demanded immediate action, it was of the highest importance that the lawfulness of the suspension should be fully established. It was under these circumstances, which were such as to arrest the attention of the country, that this law was passed. The President was authorized by it to suspend the privilege of the writ of habeas corpus, whenever, in his judgment, the public safety required; and he did, by proclamation, bearing date the 15th of September, 1863, reciting, among other things, the authority of this statute, suspend it. The suspension of the writ does not authorize the arrest of anyone, but simply denies to one arrested the privilege of this writ in order to obtain his liberty.

It is proper, therefore, to inquire under what circumstances the courts could rightfully refuse to grant this writ, and when the citizen was at liberty to invoke its aid.

The second and third sections of the law are explicit on these points. The language used is plain and direct, and the meaning of the Congress cannot be mistaken. The public safety demanded, if the President thought proper to arrest a suspected person, that he should not be required to give the cause of his detention on return to a writ of habeas corpus. But it was not contemplated that such person should be detained in custody beyond a certain fixed period, unless certain judicial proceedings, known to the common law, were commenced against him. The Secretaries of State and War were directed to furnish to the judges of the courts of the United States, a list of the names of all parties, not prisoners of war, resident in their respective jurisdictions, who then were or afterward should be held in custody by the authority of the President, and who were citizens of States in which the administration of the laws in the Federal tribunals was unimpaired. After the list was furnished, if a grand jury of the district convened and adjourned, and did not indict or present one of the persons thus named, he was entitled to his discharge; and it was the duty of the judge of the court to order him brought before him to be discharged, if he desired it. The refusal or omission to furnish the list could not operate to the injury of anyone who was not indicted or presented by the grand jury; for, if 20 days had elapsed from the time of his arrest and the termination of the session of the grand jury, he was equally entitled to his discharge as if the list were furnished, and any credible person, on petition verified by affidavit, could obtain the judge's order for that purpose.

Milligan, in his application to be released from imprisonment, averred the existence of every fact necessary under the terms of this law to give the circuit court of Indiana jurisdiction. If he was detained in custody by the order of the President, otherwise than as a prisoner of war; if he was a citizen of Indiana and had never been in the military or naval service, and the grand jury of the district had met, after he had been arrested, for a period of 20 days, and adjourned without taking any proceedings against him, then the court had the right to entertain his petition and determine the lawfulness of his imprisonment. Because the word "court" is not found in the body of the second section, it was argued at the bar, that the application should have been made to a judge of the court, and not to the court itself; but this is not so, for power is expressly conferred in the last proviso of the section on the court equally with a judge of it to discharge from imprisonment. It was the manifest design of Congress to secure a certain remedy by which anyone deprived of liberty could obtain it, if there was a judicial failure to find cause of offense against him. Courts are not always in session and can adjourn on the discharge of the grand jury; and before those who are in confinement could take proper steps to procure their liberation. To provide for this contingency, authority was given to the judges out of court to grant relief to any party who could show that under the law he should be no longer restrained of his liberty.

It was insisted that Milligan's case was defective, because it did not state that the list was furnished to the judges; and, therefore, it was impossible to say under which section of the act it was presented.

It is not easy to see how this omission could affect the question of jurisdiction. Milligan could not know that the list was furnished, unless the judges volunteered to tell him; for the law did not require that any record should be made of it or anybody but the judges informed of it. Why aver the fact when the truth of the matter was apparent to the court without an averment? How can Milligan be harmed by the absence of the averment, when he states that he was under arrest for more than 60 days before the court and grand jury, which should have considered his case, met at Indianapolis? It is apparent, therefore, that under the Habeas Corpus Act of 1863 the circuit court of Indiana had complete jurisdiction to adjudicate upon this case, and, if the judges could not agree on questions vital to the progress of the cause, they had the authority (as we have shown in a previous part of this opinion), and it was their duty to certify those questions of disagreement to this court for final decision. It was argued that a final decision on the question presented ought not to be made, because the parties who were directly concerned in the arrest and detention of Milligan, were not before the court; and their rights might be prejudiced by the answer which should be given to those questions. But this court cannot know what return will be made to the writ of habeas corpus when issued; and it is very clear that no one is concluded upon any question that may be raised to that return. In the sense of the law of 1802 which authorized a certificate of division, a final decision means final upon the points certified; final upon the court below, so that it is estopped from any adverse ruling in all the subsequent proceedings of the cause.

But it is said that this case is ended, as the presumption is, that Milligan was hanged in pursuance of the order of the President.

Although we have no judicial information on the subject, yet the inference is that he is alive; for otherwise learned counsel would not appear for him and urge this court to decide his case. It can never be in this country of written Constitution and laws, with a judicial department to interpret them, that any Chief Magistrate would be so far forgetful of his duty, as to order the execution of a man who denied the jurisdiction that tried and convicted him, after his case was before Federal judges with power to decide it, who, being unable to agree on the grave questions involved, had, according to known law, sent it to the Supreme Court of the United States for decision. But even the suggestion is injurious to the Executive, and we dismiss it from further consideration. There is, therefore, nothing to hinder this court from an investigation of the merits of this controversy.

The controlling question in the case is this: Upon the facts stated in Milligan's petition and the exhibits filed, had the military commission mentioned in it jurisdiction, legally, to try and sentence him? Milligan, not a resident of one of the rebellious States or a prisoner of war, but a citizen of Indiana for 20 years past and never in the military or naval service, is, while at his home, arrested by the military power of the United States, imprisoned, and, on certain criminal charges preferred against him, tried, convicted, and sentenced to be hanged by a military commission, organized under the direction of the military commander of the military district of Indiana. Had this tribunal the legal power and authority to try and punish this man?

No graver question was ever considered by this court, nor one which more nearly concerns the rights of the whole people, for it is the birthright of every American citizen when charged with crime to be tried and punished according to law. The power of punishment is alone through the means which the laws have provided for that purpose, and if they are ineffectual there is an immunity from punishment, no matter how great an offender the individual may be or how much his crimes may have shocked the sense of justice of the country or endangered its safety. By the protection of the law human rights are secured; withdraw that protection and they are at the mercy of wicked rulers or the clamor of an excited people. If there was law to justify this military trial, it is not our province to interfere; if there was not, it is our duty to declare the nullity of the whole proceedings. The decision of this question does not depend on argument or judicial precedents, numerous and highly illustrative as they are. These precedents inform us of the extent of the struggle to preserve liberty and to relieve those in civil life from military trials. The founders of our Government were familiar with the history of that struggle and secured in a written constitution every right which the people had wrested from power during a contest of ages. By that Constitution and the laws authorized by it, this question must be determined. The provisions of that instrument on the administration of criminal justice are too plain and direct to leave room for misconstruction or doubt of their true meaning. Those applicable to this case are found in that clause of the original Constitution, which says, "that the trial of all crimes, except in case of impeachment, shall be by jury"; and in the fourth, fifth, and sixth articles of the amendments. The fourth proclaims the right to be secure in person and effects against unreasonable search and seizure and directs that a judicial warrant shall not issue "without proof of probable cause supported by oath or affirmation."

The fifth declares "that no person shall be held to answer for a capital or otherwise infamous crime unless on presentment by a grand jury, except in cases arising in the land or naval forces, or in the Militia, when in actual service in time of war or public danger, nor be deprived of life, liberty, or property, without due process of law." And the sixth guarantees the right of trial by jury, in such manner and with such regulations that with upright judges, impartial juries, and an able bar, the innocent will be saved and the guilty punished. It is in these words: "In all criminal prosecutions the accused shall enjoy the right to a speedy and public trial by an impartial jury of the State and district wherein the crime shall have been committed, which district shall have been previously ascertained by law, and to be informed of the nature and cause of the accusation, to be confronted with the witnesses against him, to have compulsory process for obtaining witnesses in his favor, and to have the assistance of counsel for his defense." These securities for personal liberty thus embodied, were such as wisdom and experience had demonstrated to be necessary for the protection of those accused of crime. And so strong was the sense of the country of their importance, and so jealous were the people that these rights, highly prized, might be denied them by implication, that when the original Constitution was proposed for adoption it encountered severe opposition; and, but for the belief that it would be so amended as to embrace them, it would never have been ratified.

Time has proven the discernment of our ancestors; for even these provisions, expressed in such plain English words, that it would seem the ingenuity of man could not evade them, are now, after the lapse of more than 70 years, sought to be avoided. Those great and good men foresaw that troublous times would arise, when rulers and people would become restive under restraint, and seek by sharp and decisive measures to accomplish ends deemed just and proper; and that the principles of constitutional liberty would be in peril, unless established by irrepealable law. The history of the world had taught them that what was done in the past might be attempted in the future. "The Constitution of the United States is a law for rulers and people, equally in war and in peace, and covers with the shield of its protection all classes of men, at all times, and under all circumstances." No doctrine, involving more pernicious consequences, was ever invented by the wit of man than that any of its provisions can be suspended during any of the great exigencies of government. Such a doctrine leads directly to anarchy or despotism, but the theory of necessity on which it is based is false; for the Government, within the Constitution, has all the powers granted to it, which are necessary to preserve its existence, as has been happily proved by the result of the great effort to throw off its just authority.

Have any of the rights guaranteed by the Constitution been violated in the case of Milligan? and if so, what are they?

Every trial involves the exercise of judicial power; and from what source did the military commission that tried him derive their authority? Certainly no part of the judicial power of the country was conferred on them, because the Constitution expressly vests it "in one Supreme Court and such inferior courts as the Congress may from time to time ordain and establish," and it is not pretended that the commission was a court ordained and established by Congress. They cannot justify on the mandate of the President because he is controlled by law and has his appropriate sphere of duty, which is to execute, not to make, the laws; and there is "no unwritten criminal code to which resort can be had as a source of jurisdiction."

But it is said that the jurisdiction is complete under the laws and usages of war.

It can serve no useful purpose to inquire what those laws and usages are, whence they originated, where found, and on whom they operate; they can never be applied to citizens in States which have upheld the authority of the Government, and where the courts are open and their process unobstructed. This court has judicial knowledge that in Indiana the Federal authority was always unopposed, and its courts always open to hear criminal accusations and redress grievances; and no usage of war could sanction a military trial there for any offence whatever of a citizen in civil life, in nowise connected with the military service. Congress could grant no such power, and to the honor of our National Legislature be it said, it has never been provoked by the state of the country even to attempt its exercise. One of the plainest constitutional provisions was, therefore, infringed when Milligan was tried by a court not ordained and established by Congress, and not composed of judges appointed during good behavior.

Why was he not delivered to the Circuit Court of Indiana to be proceeded against according to law? No reason of necessity could be urged against it, because Congress had declared penalties against the offences charged, provided for their punishment, and directed that court to hear and determine them. And soon after this military tribunal was ended, the circuit court met, peacefully transacted its business, and adjourned. It needed no bayonets to protect it, and required no military aid to execute its judgments. It was held in a State, eminently distinguished for patriotism, by judges commissioned during the Rebellion, who were provided with juries, upright, intelligent, and selected by a marshal appointed by the President. The Government had no right to conclude that Milligan, if guilty, would not receive in that court merited punishment, for its records disclose that it was constantly engaged in the trial of similar offenses, and was never interrupted in its administration of criminal justice.

If it was dangerous, in the distracted condition of affairs, to leave Milligan unrestrained of his liberty, because he "conspired against the government, afforded aid and comfort to rebels, and incited the people to insurrection," the law said arrest him, confine him closely, render him powerless to do further mischief; and then present his case to the grand jury of the district, with proofs of his guilt, and, if indicted, try him according to the course of the common law. If this had been done, the Constitution would have been vindicated, the law of 1863 enforced, and the securities for personal liberty preserved and defended.

Another guaranty of freedom was broken when Milligan was denied a trial by jury. The great minds of the country have differed on the correct interpretation to be given to various provisions of the Federal Constitution; and judicial decision has been often invoked to settle their true meaning; but until recently no one ever doubted that the right of trial by jury was fortified in the organic law against the power of attack. It is now assailed; but if ideas can be expressed in words, and language has any meaning, this right—one of the most valuable in a free country—is preserved to everyone accused of crime who is not attached to the Army, or Navy, or militia in actual service. The sixth amendment affirms that "in all criminal prosecutions the accused shall enjoy the right to a speedy and public trial by an impartial jury," language broad enough to embrace all persons and cases; but the fifth, recognizing the necessity of an indictment, or presentment, before anyone can be held to answer for high crimes, "excepts cases arising in the land or naval forces, or in the militia, when in actual service, in time of war or public danger"; and the framers of the Constitution, doubtless, meant to limit the right of trial by jury, in the sixth amendment, to those persons who were subject to indictment or presentment in the fifth.

The discipline necessary to the efficiency of the Army and Navy, required other and swifter modes of trial than are furnished by the common-law courts; and, in pursuance of the power conferred by the Constitution, Congress has declared the kinds of trial, and the manner in which they shall be conducted, for offenses committed while the party is in the military or naval service. Every one connected with these branches of the public service is amenable to the jurisdiction which Congress has created for their government, and, while thus serving, surrenders his right to be tried by the civil courts. All other persons, citizens of States where the courts are open, if charged with crime, are guaranteed the inestimable privilege of trial by jury. This privilege is a vital principle, underlying the whole administration of criminal justice; it is not held by sufferance, and cannot be frittered away on any plea of state or political necessity. When peace prevails, and the authority of the Government is undisputed, there is no difficulty of preserving the safeguards of liberty; for the ordinary modes of trial are never neglected, and no one wishes it otherwise; but if society is disturbed by civil commotion—if the passions of men are aroused and the restraints of law weakened, if not disregarded—these safeguards need, and should receive, the watchful care of those intrusted with the guardianship of the Constitution and laws. In no other way can we transmit to posterity unimpaired the blessings of liberty, consecrated by the sacrifices of the Revolution.

It is claimed that martial law covers with its broad mantle the proceedings of this military commission. The proposition is this: That in a time of war the commander of an armed force (if in his opinion the exigencies of the country demand it, and of which he is to judge), has the power, within the lines of his military district, to suspend all civil rights and their remedies, and subject citizens as well as soldiers to the rule of his will; and in the exercise of his lawful authority cannot be restrained, except by his superior officer or the President of the United States.

If this position is sound to the extent claimed, then when war exists, foreign or domestic, and the country is subdivided into military departments for mere convenience, the commander of one of them can, if he chooses, within his limits, on the plea of necessity, with the approval of the Executive, substitute military force for and to the exclusion of the laws, and punish all persons, as he thinks right and proper, without fixed or certain rules.

The statement of this proposition shows its importance; for, if true, republican government is a failure, and there is an end of liberty regulated by law. Martial law, established on such a basis, destroys every guaranty of the Constitution, and effectually renders the military independent of and superior to the civil power—the attempt to do which by the King of Great Britain was deemed by our fathers such an offense, that they assigned it to the world as one of the causes which impelled them to declare their independence. Civil liberty and this kind of martial law cannot endure together; the antagonism is irreconcilable; and, in the conflict, one or the other must perish.

This Nation, as experience has proved, cannot always remain at peace and has no right to expect that it will always have wise and humane rulers, sincerely attached to the principles of the Constitution. Wicked men, ambitious of power, with hatred of liberty and contempt of law, may fill the place once occupied by Washington and Lincoln; and if this right is conceded, and the calamities of war again befall us, the dangers to human liberty are frightful to contemplate. If our fathers had failed to provide for just such a contingency they would have been false to the trust reposed in them. They knew—the history of the world told them—the Nation they were founding, be its existence short or long, would be involved in war; how often or how long continued, human foresight could not tell; and that unlimited power, wherever lodged at such a time, was especially hazardous to freemen. For this, and other equally weighty reasons, they secured the inheritance they had fought to maintain, by incorporating in a written Constitution the safeguards which time had proved were essential to its preservation. Not one of these safeguards can the President, or Congress, or the judiciary disturb, except the one concerning the writ of habeas corpus.

It is essential to the safety of every government that in a great crisis like the one we have just passed through, there should be a power somewhere of suspending the writ of habeas corpus. In every war there are men of previously good character wicked enough to counsel their fellow citizens to resist the measures deemed necessary by a good government to sustain its just authority and overthrow its enemies; and their influence may lead to dangerous combinations.

In the emergency of the times, an immediate public investigation according to law may not be possible; and yet the peril to the country may be too imminent to suffer such persons to go at large. Unquestionably, there is then an exigency which demands that the Government, if it should see fit in the exercise of a proper discretion to make arrests, should not be required to produce the persons arrested in answer to a writ of habeas corpus. The Constitution goes no further. It does not say after a writ of habeas corpus is denied a citizen, that he shall be tried otherwise than by the course of the common law; if it had intended this result, it would have been easy by the use of direct words to have accomplished it. The illustrious men who framed that instrument were guarding the foundations of civil liberty against the abuses of unlimited power; they were full of wisdom, and the lessons of history informed them that a trial by an established court, assisted by an impartial jury, was the only sure way of protecting the citizen against oppression and wrong. Knowing this, they limited the suspension to one great right, and left the rest to remain forever inviolable. But, it is insisted that the safety of the country in time of war demands that this broad claim for martial law shall be sustained. If this were true, it could be well said that a country, preserved at the sacrifice of all the cardinal principles of liberty, is not worth the cost of preservation. Happily, it is not so.

It will be borne in mind that this is not a question of the power to proclaim martial law, when war exists in a community and the courts and civil authorities are overthrown. Nor is it a question what rule a military commander, at the head of his army, can impose on States in rebellion to cripple their resources and quell the insurrection. The jurisdiction claimed is much more extensive. The necessities of the service, during the late rebellion, required that the loyal States should be placed within the limits of certain military districts and commanders appointed in them; and, it is urged, that this, in a military sense, constituted them the theater of military operations; and, as in this case, Indiana had been and was again threatened with invasion by the enemy, the occasion was furnished to establish martial law. The conclusion does not follow from the premises. If armies were collected in Indiana, they were to be employed in another locality, where the laws were obstructed and the national authority disputed. On her soil there was no hostile foot; if once invaded, that invasion was at an end, and with it all pretext for martial law. Martial law cannot arise from a threatened invasion. The necessity must be actual and present; the invasion real, such as effectually closes the courts and deposes the civil administration.

It is difficult to see how the safety of the country required martial law in Indiana. If any of her citizens were plotting treason, the power of arrest could secure them, until the Government was prepared for their trial, when the courts were open and ready to try them. It was as easy to protect witnesses before a civil as a military tribunal; and as there could be no wish to convict, except on sufficient legal evidence, surely an ordained and established court was better able to judge of this than a military tribunal composed of gentlemen not trained to the profession of the law.

It follows, from what has been said on this subject, that there are occasions when martial rule can be properly applied. If, in foreign invasion or civil war, the courts are actually closed, and it is impossible to administer criminal justice according to law, then, on the theater of active military operations, where war really prevails, there is a necessity to furnish a substitute for the civil authority, thus overthrown, to preserve the safety of the Army and society, and as no power is left but the military, it is allowed to govern by martial rule until the laws can have their free course. As necessity creates the rule, so it limits its duration; for, if this Government is continued after the courts are reinstated, it is a gross usurpation of power. Martial rule can never exist where the courts are open, and in the proper and unobstructed exercise of their jurisdiction. It is also confined to the locality of actual war. Because, during the late rebellion it could have been enforced in Virginia, where the national authority was overturned and the courts driven out, it does not follow that it should obtain in Indiana, where that authority was never disputed, and justice was always administered. And so in the case of a foreign invasion, martial rule may become a necessity in one State, when, in another, it would be "mere lawless violence."

We are not without precedents in English and American history illustrating our views of this question, but it is hardly necessary to make particular reference to them.

From the first year of the reign of Edward III, when the Parliament of England reversed the attainder of the Earl of Lancaster, because he could have been tried by the courts of the realm, and declared, "that in time of peace no man ought to be adjudged to death for treason or any other offense without being arraigned and held to answer; and that regularly when the king's courts are open it is a time of peace in judgment of law," down to the present day, martial law, as claimed in this case, has been condemned by all respectable English jurists as contrary to the fundamental laws of the land, and subversive of the liberty of the subject.

During the present century, an instructive debate on this question occurred in Parliament, occasioned by the trial and conviction by court martial, at Demerara, of the Reverend John Smith, a missionary to the Negroes, on the alleged ground of aiding and abetting a formidable rebellion in that colony. Those eminent statesmen, Lord Brougham and Sir James Mackintosh, participated in that debate; and denounced the trial as illegal; because it did not appear that the courts of law in Demerara could not try offenses, and that "when the laws can act, every other mode of punishing supposed crimes is itself an enormous crime."

So sensitive were our Revolutionary fathers on this subject, although Boston was almost in a state of siege, when General Gage issued his proclamation of martial law, they spoke of it as an "attempt to supersede the course of the common law, and instead thereof to publish and order the use of martial law." The Virginia Assembly also denounced a similar measure on the part of Governor Dunmore "as an assumed power, which the king himself cannot exercise; because it annuls the law of the land and introduces the most execrable of all systems, the martial law."

In some parts of the country, during the War of 1812, our officers made arbitrary arrests and, by military tribunals, tried citizens who were not in the military service. These arrests and trials, when brought to the notice of the courts, were uniformly condemned as illegal. The cases of Smith v. Shaw and McConnell v. Hampden (reported in 12 Johnson[7]) are illustrations which we cite not only for the principles they determine but on account of the distinguished jurists concerned in the decisions, one of whom for many years occupied a seat on this bench.

It is contended that Luther v. Borden, decided by this court, is an authority for the claim of martial law advanced in this case. The decision is misapprehended. That case grew out of the attempt in Rhode Island to supersede the old colonial government by a revolutionary proceeding. Rhode Island, until that period, had no other form of local government than the charter granted by King Charles II in 1663; and as that limited the right of suffrage, and did not provide for its own amendment, many citizens became dissatisfied because the legislature would not afford the relief in their power; and without the authority of law, formed a new and independent constitution and proceeded to assert its authority by force of arms. The old government resisted this; and as the rebellion was formidable, called out the militia to subdue it and passed an act declaring martial law.

Borden, in the military service of the old government, broke open the house of Luther, who supported the new, in order to arrest him.

[7] Pp. 257 and 234.

Luther brought suit against Borden, and the question was whether, under the constitution and laws of the State, Borden was justified. This court held that a State "may use its military power to put down an armed insurrection too strong to be controlled by the civil authority"; and, if the Legislature of Rhode Island thought the peril so great as to require the use of its military forces and the declaration of martial law, there was no ground on which this court could question its authority, and as Borden acted under military orders of the charter government, which had been recognized by the political power of the country, and was upheld by the State judiciary, he was justified in breaking into and entering Luther's house. This is the extent of the decision. There was no question in issue about the power of declaring martial law under the Federal Constitution, and the court did not consider it necessary even to inquire "to what extent nor under what circumstances that power may be exercised by a State."

We do not deem it important to examine further the adjudged cases, and shall, therefore, conclude without any additional reference to authorities.

To the third question, then, on which the judges below were opposed in opinion, an answer in the negative must be returned.

It is proper to say, although Milligan's trial and conviction by a military commission was illegal, yet if guilty of the crimes imputed to him, and his guilt had been ascertained by an established court and impartial jury, he deserved severe punishment. Open resistance to the measures deemed necessary to subdue a great rebellion by those who enjoy the protection of government and have not the excuse even of prejudice of section to plead in their favor is wicked, but that resistance becomes an enormous crime when it assumes the form of a secret political organization armed to oppose the laws and seeks by stealthy means to introduce the enemies of the country into peaceful communities, there to light the torch of civil war and thus overthrow the power of the United States. Conspiracies like these at such a juncture are extremely perilous, and those concerned in them are dangerous enemies to their country and should receive the heaviest penalties of the law as an example to deter others from similar criminal conduct. It is said the severity of the laws caused them, but Congress was obliged to enact severe laws to meet the crisis, and as our highest civil duty is to serve our country when in danger the late war has proved that rigorous laws when necessary will be cheerfully obeyed by a patriotic people struggling to preserve the rich blessings of a free government.

The two remaining questions in this case must be answered in the affirmative. The suspension of the privilege of the writ of habeas corpus does not suspend the writ itself. The writ issues as a matter of course, and on the return made to it the court decides whether the party applying is denied the right of proceeding any further with it.

If the military trial of Milligan was contrary to law, then he was entitled, on the facts stated in his petition, to be discharged from custody by the terms of the act of Congress of March 3, 1863. The provisions of this law having been considered in a previous part of this opinion, we will not restate the views there presented. Milligan avers he was a citizen of Indiana, not in the military or naval service, and was detained in close confinement, by order of the President, from the 5th day of October 1864 until the 2d day of January 1865, when the Circuit Court for the District of Indiana, with a grand jury, convened in session at Indianapolis; and afterward, on the 27th day of the same month, adjourned without finding an indictment or presentment against him. If these averments were true (and their truth is conceded for the purposes of this case), the court was required to liberate him on taking certain oaths prescribed by the law and entering into recognizance for his good behavior.

But it is insisted that Milligan was a prisoner of war, and, therefore, excluded from the privileges of the statute. It is not easy to see how he can be treated as a prisoner of war when he lived in Indiana for the past 20 years, was arrested there, and had not been, during the late troubles, a resident of any of the States in rebellion. If in Indiana he conspired with bad men to assist the enemy, he is punishable for it in the courts of Indiana; but, when tried for the offense, he cannot plead the rights of war, for he was not engaged in legal acts of hostility against the Government, and only such persons, when captured, are prisoners of war. If he cannot enjoy the immunities attaching to the character of a prisoner of war, how can he be subject to their pains and penalties?

This case, as well as the kindred cases of Bowles and Horsey, were disposed of at the last term, and the proper orders were entered of record. There is, therefore, no additional entry required.

The Chief Justice delivered the following opinion:

Four members of the Court, concurring with their brethren in the order heretofore made in this cause, but unable to concur in some important particulars with the opinion which has just been read, think it their duty to make a separate statement of their views of the whole case.

We do not doubt that the Circuit Court for the District of Indiana had jurisdiction of the petition of Milligan for the writ of habeas corpus.

Whether this Court has jurisdiction upon the certificate of division admits of more question. The construction of the act authorizing such certificates, which has hitherto prevailed here, denies jurisdiction in cases where the certificate brings up the whole cause before the Court. But none of the adjudicated cases are exactly in point, and we are willing to resolve whatever doubt may exist in favor of the earliest possible answers to questions involving life and liberty. We agree, therefore, that this Court may properly answer questions certified in such a case as that before us.

The crimes with which Milligan was charged were of the gravest character, and the petition and exhibits in the record, which must here be taken as true, admit his guilt. But whatever his desert of punishment may be, it is more important to the country and to every citizen that he should not be punished under an illegal sentence, sanctioned by this Court of last resort, than that he should be punished at all. The laws which protect the liberties of the whole people must not be violated or set aside in order to inflict, even upon the guilty, unauthorized though merited justice.

The trial and sentence of Milligan were by military commission convened in Indiana during the fall of 1864. The action of the commission had been under consideration by President Lincoln for some time, when he himself became the victim of an abhorred conspiracy. It was approved by his successor in May 1865 and the sentence was ordered to be carried into execution. The proceedings, therefore, had the fullest sanction of the executive department of the Government.

This sanction requires the most respectful and the most careful consideration of this Court. The sentence which it supports must not be set aside except upon the clearest conviction that it cannot be reconciled with the Constitution and the constitutional legislation of Congress.

We must inquire, then, what constitutional or statutory provisions have relation to this military proceeding.

The act of Congress of March 3, 1863, comprises all the legislation which seems to require consideration in this connection. The constitutionality of this act has not been questioned and is not doubted.

The first section authorized the suspension, during the Rebellion, of the writ of habeas corpus throughout the United States by the President. The two next sections limited this authority in important respects.

The second section required that lists of all persons, being citizens of States in which the administration of the laws had continued unimpaired, in the Federal courts, who were then held or might thereafter be held as prisoners of the United States, under the authority of the President, otherwise than as prisoners of war, should be furnished to the judges of the circuit and district courts. The lists transmitted to the judges were to contain the names of all persons, residing within their respective jurisdictions, charged with violation of national law. And it was required, in cases where the grand jury in attendance upon any of these courts should terminate its session without proceeding by indictment or otherwise against any prisoner named in the list, that the judge of the court should forthwith make an order that such prisoner desiring a discharge, should be brought before him or the court to be discharged, on entering into recognizance, if required, to keep the peace and for good behavior, or to appear, as the court might direct, to be further dealt with according to law. Every officer of the United States having custody of such prisoners was required to obey and execute the judge's order, under penalty, for refusal or delay, of fine and imprisonment.

The third section provided, in case lists of persons other than prisoners of war then held in confinement, or thereafter arrested, should not be furnished within 20 days after the passage of the act, or, in cases of subsequent arrest, within 20 days after the time of arrest, that any citizen, after the termination of a session of the grand jury without indictment or presentment, might, by petition alleging the facts and verified by oath, obtain the judge's order of discharge in favor of any person so imprisoned, on the terms and conditions prescribed in the second section.

It was made the duty of the District Attorney of the United States to attend examinations on petitions for discharge.

It was under this act that Milligan petitioned the Circuit Court for the District of Indiana for discharge from imprisonment.

The holding of the circuit and district courts of the United States in Indiana had been uninterrupted. The administration of the laws in the Federal courts had remained unimpaired. Milligan was imprisoned under the authority of the President, and was not a prisoner of war. No list of prisoners had been furnished to the judges, either of the district or circuit courts, as required by the law. A grand jury had attended the circuit courts of the Indiana district, while Milligan was there imprisoned, and had closed its session without finding any indictment or presentment or otherwise proceeding against the prisoner.

His case was thus brought within the precise letter and intent of the act of Congress, unless it can be said that Milligan was not imprisoned by authority of the President; and nothing of this sort was claimed in argument on the part of the Government.

It is clear upon this statement that the circuit court was bound to hear Milligan's petition for the writ of habeas corpus, called in the act an order to bring the prisoner before the judge or the court, and to issue the writ, or, in the language of the act, to make the order.

The first question, therefore—Ought the writ to issue?—must be answered in the affirmative.

And it is equally clear that he was entitled to the discharge prayed for.

It must be borne in mind that the prayer of the petition was not for an absolute discharge, but to be delivered from military custody and imprisonment, and if found probably guilty of any offense, to be turned over to the proper tribunal for inquiry and punishment; or, if not found thus probably guilty, to be discharged altogether.

And the express terms of the act of Congress required this action of the court. The prisoner must be discharged on giving such recognizance as the court should require, not only for good behavior, but for appearance, as directed by the court, to answer and be further dealt with according to law.

The first section of the act authorized the suspension of the writ of habeas corpus generally throughout the United States. The second and third sections limited this suspension, in certain cases, within States where the administration of justice by the Federal courts remained unimpaired. In these cases the writ was still to issue, and under it the prisoner was entitled to his discharge by a circuit or district judge or court, unless held to bail for appearance to answer charges. No other judge or court could make an order of discharge under the writ. Except under the circumstances pointed out by the act, neither circuit nor district judge or court could make such an order. But under those circumstances the writ must be issued and the relief from imprisonment directed by the act must be afforded. The commands of the act were positive and left no discretion to court or judge.

An affirmative answer must, therefore, be given to the second question, namely: Ought Milligan to be discharged according to the prayer of the petition?

That the third question, namely: Had the military commission in Indiana, under the facts stated, jurisdiction to try and sentence Milligan? must be answered negatively is an unavoidable inference from affirmative answers to the other two.

The military commission could not have jurisdiction to try and sentence Milligan, if he could not be detained in prison under his original arrest or under sentence, after the close of a session of the grand jury without indictment or other proceeding against him.

Indeed, the act seems to have been framed on purpose to secure the trial of all offenses of citizens by civil tribunals, in States where these tribunals were not interrupted in the regular exercise of their functions.

Under it, in such States, the privilege of the writ might be suspended. Any person regarded as dangerous to the public safety might be arrested and detained until after the session of a grand jury. Until after such session no person arrested could have the benefit of the writ; and even then no such person could be discharged except on such terms, as to future appearance, as the court might impose. These provisions obviously contemplate no other trial or sentence than that of a civil court, and we could not assert the legality of a trial and sentence by a military commission, under the circumstances specified in the act and described in the petition, without disregarding the plain directions of Congress.

We agree, therefore, that the first two questions certified must receive affirmative answers and the last a negative. We do not doubt that the positive provisions of the act of Congress require such answers. We do not think it necessary to look beyond these provisions. In them we find sufficient and controlling reasons for our conclusions.

But the opinion which has just been read goes further; and as we understand it, asserts not only that the military commission held in Indiana was not authorized by Congress but that it was not in the power of Congress to authorize it; from which it may be thought to follow that Congress has no power to indemnify the officers who composed the commission against liability in civil courts for acting as members of it.

We cannot agree to this.

We agree in the proposition that no department of the Government of the United States—neither President, nor Congress, nor the courts—possesses any power not given by the Constitution.

We assent, fully, to all that is said, in the opinion, of the inestimable value of the trial by jury, and of the other constitutional safeguards of civil liberty. And we concur, also, in what is said of the writ of habeas corpus, and of its suspension, with two reservations: (1) That, in our judgment, when the writ is suspended, the Executive is authorized to arrest as well as to detain; and (2) that there are cases in which, the privilege of the writ being suspended, trial and punishment by military commission, in States where civil courts are open, may be authorized by Congress, as well as arrest and detention.

We think that Congress had power, though not exercised, to authorize the military commission which was held in Indiana.

We do not think it necessary to discuss at large the grounds of our conclusions. We will briefly indicate some of them.

The Constitution itself provides for military government as well as for civil government. And we do not understand it to be claimed that the civil safeguards of the Constitution have application in cases within the proper sphere of the former.

What, then, is that proper sphere? Congress has power to raise and support Armies; to provide and maintain a Navy; to make rules for the government and regulation of the land and naval forces; and to provide for governing such part of the militia as may be in the service of the United States.

It is not denied that the power to make rules for the government of the Army and Navy is a power to provide for trial and punishment by military courts without a jury. It has been so understood and exercised from the adoption of the Constitution to the present time.

Nor, in our judgment, does the fifth or any other amendment abridge that power. "Cases arising in the land and naval forces, or in the militia in actual service in time of war or public danger," are expressly excepted from the fifth amendment, "that no person shall be held to answer for a capital or otherwise infamous crime, unless on a presentment or indictment of a grand jury," and it is admitted that the exception applies to the other amendments as well as to the fifth.

Now, we understand this exception to have the same import and effect as if the powers of Congress in relation to the government of the Army and Navy and the militia had been recited in the amendment, and cases within those powers had been expressly excepted from its operation. The States, most jealous of encroachments upon the liberties of the citizen, when proposing additional safeguards in the form of amendments, excluded specifically from their effect cases arising in the government of the land and naval forces. Thus Massachusetts proposed that "no person shall be tried for any crime by which he would incur an infamous punishment or loss of life until he be first indicted by a grand jury, except in such cases as may arise in the government and regulation of the land forces." The exception in similar amendments, proposed by New York, Maryland, and Virginia was in the same or equivalent terms. The amendments proposed by the States were considered by the First Congress, and such as were approved in substance were put in form and proposed by that body to the States. Among those thus proposed and subsequently ratified was that which now stands as the fifth amendment of the Constitution. We cannot doubt that this amendment was intended to have the same force and effect as the amendment proposed by the States. We cannot agree to a construction which will impose on the exception in the fifth amendment a sense other than that obviously indicated by action of the State conventions.

We think, therefore, that the power of Congress, in the government of the land and naval forces and of the militia, is not at all affected by the fifth or any other amendment. It is not necessary to attempt any precise definition of the boundaries of this power. But may it not be said that government includes protection and defense as well as the regulation of internal administration? And is it impossible to imagine cases in which citizens conspiring or attempting the destruction or great injury of the national forces may be subjected by Congress to military trial and punishment in the just exercise of this undoubted constitutional power? Congress is but the agent of the Nation, and does not the security of individuals against the abuse of this, as of every other power, depend on the intelligence and virtue of the people, on their zeal for public and private liberty, upon official responsibility secured by law, and upon the frequency of elections, rather than upon doubtful constructions of legislative powers?

But we do not put our opinion, that Congress might authorize such a military commission as was held in Indiana, upon the power to provide for the government of the national forces.

Congress has the power not only to raise and support and govern armies but to declare war. It has, therefore, the power to provide by law for carrying on war. This power necessarily extends to all legislation essential to the prosecution of war with vigor and success, except such as interferes with the command of the forces and the conduct of campaigns. That power and duty belong to the President as Commander in Chief. Both these powers are derived from the Constitution, but neither is defined by that instrument. Their extent must be determined by their nature, and by the principles of our institutions.

The power to make the necessary laws is in Congress; the power to execute in the President. Both powers imply many subordinate and auxiliary powers. Each includes all authorities essential to its due exercise. But neither can the President, in war more than in peace, intrude upon the proper authority of Congress, nor Congress upon the proper authority of the President. Both are servants of the people, whose will is expressed in the fundamental law. Congress cannot direct the conduct of campaigns, nor can the President, or any commander under him, without the sanction of Congress, institute tribunals for the trial and punishment of offenses, either of soldiers or civilians, unless in cases of a controlling necessity, which justifies what it compels, or at least insures acts of indemnity from the justice of the legislature.

We by no means assert that Congress can establish and apply the laws of war where no war has been declared or exists.

Where peace exists the laws of peace must prevail. What we do maintain is, that when the Nation is involved in war, and some portions of the country are invaded, and all are exposed to invasion, it is within the power of Congress to determine in what States or districts such great and imminent public danger exists as justifies the authorization of military tribunals for the trial of crimes and offenses against the discipline or security of the Army or against the public safety.

In Indiana, for example, at the time of the arrest of Milligan and his coconspirators, it is established by the papers in the record, that the State was a military district, was the theater of military operations, had been actually invaded, and was constantly threatened with invasion. It appears, also, that a powerful secret association, composed of citizens and others, existed within the State, under military organization, conspiring against the draft, and plotting insurrection, the liberation of the prisoners of war at various depots, the seizure of the State and National arsenals, armed cooperation with the enemy, and war against the National Government.

We cannot doubt that, in such a time of public danger, Congress had power, under the Constitution, to provide for the organization of a military commission, and for trial by that commission of persons engaged in this conspiracy. The fact that the Federal courts were open was regarded by Congress as a sufficient reason for not exercising the power; but that fact could not deprive Congress of the right to exercise it. Those courts might be open and undisturbed in the execution of their functions, and yet wholly incompetent to avert threatened danger, or to punish, with adequate promptitude and certainty, the guilty conspirators.

In Indiana, the judges and officers of the courts were loyal to the Government. But it might have been otherwise. In times of rebellion and civil war it may often happen, indeed, that judges and marshals will be in active sympathy with the rebels, and courts their most efficient allies.

We have confined ourselves to the question of power. It was for Congress to determine the question of expediency. And Congress did determine it. That body did not see fit to authorize trials by military commission in Indiana, but by the strongest implication prohibited them. With that prohibition we are satisfied, and should have remained silent if the answers to the questions certified had been put on that ground, without denial of the existence of a power which we believe to be constitutional and important to the public safety, a denial which, as we have already suggested, seems to draw in question the power of Congress to protect from prosecution the members of military commissions who acted in obedience to their superior officers, and whose action, whether warranted by law or not, was approved by that upright and patriotic President under whose administration the Republic was rescued from threatened destruction.

We have thus far said little of martial law, nor do we propose to say much. What we have already said sufficiently indicates our opinion that there is no law for the government of the citizens, the Armies or the Navy of the United States, within American jurisdiction, which is not contained in or derived from the Constitution. And wherever our Army or Navy may go beyond our territorial limits, neither can go beyond the authority of the President or the legislation of Congress.

There are under the Constitution three kinds of military jurisdiction: One to be exercised both in peace and war; another to be exercised in time of foreign war without the boundaries of the United States, or in time of rebellion and civil war within States or districts occupied by rebels treated as belligerents; and a third to be exercised in time of invasion or insurrection within the limits of the United States, or during rebellion within the limits of States maintaining adhesion to the National Government, when the public danger requires its exercise. The first of these may be called jurisdiction under military law, and is found in acts of Congress prescribing rules and articles of war, or otherwise providing for the government of the national forces; the second may be distinguished as military government, superseding, as far as may be deemed expedient, the local law, and exercised by the military commander under the direction of the President, with the express or implied sanction of Congress; while the third may be denominated martial law proper, and is called into action by Congress, or temporarily, when the action of Congress cannot be invited, and in the case of justifying or excusing peril, by the President, in times of insurrection or invasion, or of civil or foreign war, within districts or localities where ordinary law no longer adequately secures public safety and private rights.

We think that the power of Congress, in such times and in such localities, to authorize trials for crimes against the security and safety of the national forces, may be derived from its constitutional authority to raise and support armies and to declare war, if not from its constitutional authority to provide for governing the national forces.

We have no apprehension that this power, under our American system of government, in which all official authority is derived from the people, and exercised under direct responsibility to the people, is more likely to be abused than the power to regulate commerce, or the power to borrow money. And we are unwilling to give our assent by silence to expressions of opinion which seem to us calculated, though not intended, to cripple the constitutional powers of the Government, and to augment the public dangers in times of invasion and rebellion.

Mr. Justice Wayne, Mr. Justice Swayne, and Mr. Justice Miller concur with me in these views.

Mr. CONNALLY. Mr. President, my observation is that one of the important points in that opinion is that under the Constitution there are ways in which this Government, as a democracy, may properly and fully exercise all the necessary powers to carry on this war or any other war, provided those powers are exercised through the appropriate departments of the Government and under constitutional provisions.

Mr. WHEELER. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. CONNALLY. I yield.

Mr. WHEELER. The Senator does not mean "this war"?

Mr. CONNALLY. Any war in which we may be engaged, including the war of words which we have had this afternoon. [Laughter.]

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Mr. President, I do not desire to detain the Senate further; but I wish to say that I have listened with very great interest to the plea in confession and avoidance made by the Senator from Florida [Mr. PEPPER] with regard to the radio broadcast made last night by Mr. Fulton Lewis.

Irrespective of what Mr. Lewis may have said as to a conversation which he had with the Senator from Florida yesterday, and irrespective of the memory of the Senator from Florida or of the Senator from Montana [Mr. WHEELER] as to an alleged conversation which took place between them at the Chicago convention, I make bold to assert that there is no essential difference between the explanation of the Senator from Florida and Mr. Lewis' broadcast last night. Furthermore, I make bold to assert that Mr. Lewis' broadcast of last night did not go as far and was not as all-embracing in its scope as the speech made on the floor of the Senate a few weeks ago by the Senator from Florida himself, in his own proper person, embodying his seven-point program, to which I, among other Senators, listened.

Mr. President, I have listened with very great interest this afternoon to the Senator from Florida; and I assert that neither in his remarks this afternoon nor in his speech upon his seven-point program a few weeks ago is there any power asserted to have been exercised by either Hitler or Mussolini, or, for that matter, by Genghis Khan or Nero, which he does not propose to confer upon the President of the United States at a time when we are not at war.

Mr. President, I hold no brief for Fulton Lewis. I have heard him make many inaccurate statements in his radio broadcasts, and I dare say I shall hear many more. Very recently Mr. Lewis saw fit to butt into a factional political fight in a Missouri primary, attempting to aid one candidate who was afterward repudiated by the people of Missouri at a primary election, in the course of which effort Mr. Lewis made numerous misrepresentations. However, in view of the various references to and partial quotations from Mr. Lewis' broadcast last night, it seems to me it is only fair that Mr. Lewis' complete broadcast be inserted in the RECORD so that anyone who chooses may compare the statements of the Senator from Montana and the Senator from Florida with Mr. Lewis' original broadcast and draw any conclusion he wishes. I ask unanimous consent that the complete statement of Mr. Lewis be printed in the Appendix of the RECORD.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Mr. President, I further ask leave to send forward an amendment which I intend to propose to the pending bill and ask that it may be printed and lie upon the table.

Let me say in that connection that the amendment which I propose to offer is a bill which I introduced some months ago for the abolition of the War Department and the Navy Department and the combination of both of them into a new Department of National Defense, with coordinate branches for the regulation of the Army, the Navy, and the Air Corps.

I ask that my amendment be printed and lie on the table.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, the amendment will be received, printed, and lie on the table.

Mr. BONE. Mr. President, I do not rise for the purpose of adding anything to the clash of arms this afternoon. I should like to refer for just a moment to the interesting contribution of the Senator from Texas to the historical discussion and to the reference of the able Senator from New Mexico [Mr. HATCH] to the wartime powers which were exercised by President Lincoln.

I think we should bear in mind that at one time, in a time of peace, a very energetic President of the United States, confronted with a decision of the Supreme Court of the United States written by a gentleman for whom he had very little use, said, "Old John Marshall has made his decision; let him enforce it."

What did John Marshall do? The President had all the United States marshals under his control, and the Supreme Court did exactly what any court having no coercive power would do. Andrew Jackson did what he pleased, and John Marshall probably accepted it. Not having known the gentleman or having been privileged to consort with him, I have not any idea what his state of mind was; but were I Chief Justice of the United States, and were the President to tell me to enforce a decision if I did not like it, I think I would feel a little badly about it.

Lincoln during the Civil War had probably from three-quarters of a million to a million men under arms—men who were begrimed by field after field of battle, men whose eyes had witnessed scenes of desolation the like of which the country had never before witnessed. Here was the country torn with strife, divided as it was in a terrible war between a great bloc of States in the South on the one hand and a great bloc of States in the North on the other; and, of course, Lincoln was not going to allow something to get in the way; and when the Supreme Court, I think, at one time attempted to issue a writ of habeas corpus, Lincoln said, "Forget it"; and we know what happened.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. He simply ignored it.

Mr. BONE. Yes.

Mr. CONNALLY. Mr. President, if the Senator will yield, one case arose in Maryland, in which some civilians were incarcerated, and they applied for a writ of habeas corpus. Judge Taney wrote the opinion of the Court liberating them. He sent the opinion through the clerk to the military officers, and they simply ignored it. They paid no attention to it. Under the instructions of the President, the commanding generals and others completely ignored it, and Judge Taney was in personal fear of being himself placed in jail. He told his family, the day he wrote the opinion, that he did not know whether he would be home that night or not; that he might be in jail. The officers ignored the opinion.

Mr. BONE. That is correct. The Senator from Texas is absolutely right when he says that the supreme law of the land is the Constitution, and it is not abrogated by war; but, on the other hand, we face the cold, hard, physical fact that the Supreme Court of the United States and the lower courts of the United States have no coercive power. We obey their orders only because we want to be decent Americans. There is not any physical power residing in any court to enforce its own orders. If the courts order a man hanged, the officials of the State may refuse to hang him; and in wartime, Lincoln, the Commander in Chief of the United States Army, simply told the courts to forget what they were trying to do when it did not suit his convenience.

Here were half a million men who had fought at Gettysburg, and at Cold Harbor, and at Mine Run, and at Antietam, and all the other bloody battles of the war. They owed allegiance to Lincoln. They did not owe it to some nebulous body; and that is why there grew up that to which the Senator from New Mexico [Mr. HATCH] referred.

Of course, any historian, in writing a narrative of that kind, may say that the President exercised supreme power. Everybody knows that he did; it does not prove anything; but it ought to prove to us here in the Senate that wartime powers are not pleasant things for anybody. I never thought I should live long enough to find the Senate of the United States, calmly or otherwise—perhaps more otherwise than calmly—debating the question whether or not, while the country is at peace, we should give the President of the United States the supreme power of a dictator, because that is what it would imply—these wartime powers, whether they are lawful powers or not.

Mr. PEPPER. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. BONE. That is why I made reference to acts of Congress. Whether they are lawfully exercised powers or not, the fact is that sometimes, through force of necessity, a man is compelled to exercise them. That is the tragedy of it. I do not believe any member of this body will say that Lincoln wanted to tell all the courts to "Go to ———," to use the vernacular. There probably never breathed under the American flag a man who had more reverence for law, a greater reverance for all the beautiful traditions of America, than Abraham Lincoln had; and yet he told the courts to "forget it," and every Member of this body knows it. He did what the Senator from New Mexico [Mr. HATCH], speaking through the pen of the historian, says he did. It was not because Lincoln was a bad man. It was because war made him feel that he had to do it. We must not compare action of that kind with solemn legislative powers. The thing I am talking about is what we would do.

I think the Senator from Florida [Mr. PEPPER] is absolutely sincere in feeling that that is a desirable thing to do. I cannot bring myself to believe it, however, and I know that if we give the President full wartime powers, then we ought to go a step further and give him the powers contemplated by the mobilization plan which the War Department cooked up beginning back in 1920; and that is the most ruthless, cold, hard dictatorship possible to imagine in America, at least. It is as ruthless and cold a dictatorship as we could ever hope under any circumstances to have Americans swallow, because it washes up the last traditional aspect of American social, business, economic, and political life.

When the mobilization plan comes along we shall not have to worry about whether commentators comment right on us, or whether columnists columnize right on us, or whether the boys in the press gallery write the right stuff, or not. They will be told what to write. They will not write anything but what they get off a teletype that will come through the War Department. Of course, the press of America has a great stake in this matter. Every single aspect of freedom that is implicit in the whole American system is wrapped up in this mobilization plan that the War Department has. If we are to give the President full wartime powers, then we ought to give him all the powers that are implicit in the mobilization plan, and I just cannot contemplate that being done. I think it would be terrible. It would be a crucifixion of all that we believe in.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

WEDNESDAY, AUGUST 14, 1940

The House met at 12 o'clock noon.

Rev. Bernard Braskamp, D. D., pastor of Gunton Temple Memorial Presbyterian Church, Washington, D. C., offered the following prayer:

O Thou whom finite thought cannot comprehend and whose resources human need cannot exhaust, Thou art the bountiful Giver of all our blessings. We are bringing unto Thee our burdened hearts and empty hands.

Grant that as we move forward into the unknown experiences of this day, we may be conscious of divine guidance and companionship. In all the perplexing relations of life, may we have courage and strength to follow the path which Thou hast marked out for us.

May we be numbered among those who earnestly desire and zealously labor for the coming of the Kingdom of God, when the heart of man shall be filled with peace and gladness.

Hear and answer our prayer for the sake of the Christ our Saviour. Amen.

The Journal of the proceedings of yesterday was read and approved.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE

A message from the Senate, by Mr. Frazier, its legislative clerk, announced that the Senate had passed without amendment a bill of the House of the following title:

H. R. 7173. An act for the relief of Walter Chwalek.

PERMISSION TO ADDRESS THE HOUSE

Mr. SWEENEY. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for 1 minute and to extend my remarks in the RECORD at this point and to include a short newspaper article.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Ohio?

There was no objection.

[Mr. SWEENEY addressed the House. His remarks appear in the Appendix of the RECORD.]

Mr. SECREST. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for 1 minute.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Ohio?

There was no objection.

Mr. SECREST. Mr. Speaker, I have long felt that conscription would seriously impair the credit structure of this country. This is confirmed in the Philadelphia Record of Monday, which says:

Unmarried men of draft age—21 to 31—are finding many difficulties in their relations with business, finance, and industry.

WHAT THEY FACE

In addition to emotional complications and uncertainty about their futures, they right now face these practical difficulties:

1. Banks and loan companies are refusing to give them personal loans, regardless of their characters, references, or jobs.
2. It is virtually impossible for them to buy automobiles, unless they can pay spot cash.
3. It is next to impossible for them to open new charge accounts.
4. Several industries which heretofore preferred young men for training for semiskilled and skilled jobs seem to favor older men now.

I do not see the advantage of destroying the credit of 12,000,000 men to secure 1,000,000 men for service, and I believe the bill I introduced over 2 weeks ago to shorten the period of voluntary enlistment to 1 year and increase the pay from $21 to $30 a month will get men faster than we can furnish them with the necessary equipment.

I claim that conscription will cause a serious business depression that may equal any business gains that otherwise would result from the rearmament program.

Furthermore, Congress should quit wasting time in debate and act at once to encourage volunteers in view of the critical situation developing in England. [Applause.]

LOSSES FROM ERADICATION OF MEDITERRANEAN FRUITFLY IN FLORIDA

Mr. CLARK, from the Committee on Rules, submitted the following resolution (H. Res. 568) which was referred to the House Calendar and ordered printed:

House Resolution 568

Resolved, That immediately upon the adoption of this resolution it shall be in order to move that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of Senate Concurrent Resolution 40, a concurrent resolution creating a special joint committee to investigate the matter of losses resulting from the Mediterranean fruitfly eradication campaign in Florida in 1929 and 1930, and all points of order against said resolution are hereby waived. That after general debate, which shall be confined to the resolution and shall continue not to exceed 1 hour, to be equally divided and controlled by the chairman and the ranking minority member of the Committee on Rules, the resolution shall be read for amendment under the 5-minute rule. At the conclusion of the reading of the resolution for amendment the Committee shall rise and report the same to the House with such amendments as may have been adopted, and the previous question shall be considered as ordered on the resolution and amendments thereto to final passage without intervening motion except one motion to recommit.

R. F. BRAZELTON

Mr. NORRELL. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to call up the bill (H. R. 7826) for the relief of R. F. Brazelton, for the purpose of concurring in a Senate amendment.

The Clerk read the title of the bill.

The Clerk read the Senate amendment, as follows:

Mr. MICHENER. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, has the gentleman talked with the minority member of the committee?

Mr. NORRELL. I will say to the gentleman that I have discussed this with the chairman of the Claims Committee. The point is that the Claims Committee allowed a bill in the amount of $360 and it was passed by the House unanimously. The Senate adopted an amendment reducing the amount 50 percent.

Mr. MICHENER. And the gentleman is accepting the reduction?

Mr. NORRELL. Yes.

Mr. MICHENER. I have no objection.

The Senate amendment was agreed to.

A motion to reconsider was laid on the table.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

Mr. THORKELSON. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD and to include therein a resolution from the Communist International.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. SABATH. Mr. Speaker, I reserve the right to object. Notwithstanding the gentleman's defeat for reelection, in the last few days he has clogged up the RECORD again with a lot of articles and statements which I know to be unfair and unjust. In view of that, I object.

PERSONAL EXPLANATION

Mr. RANDOLPH. Mr. Speaker, on roll call 178, if present, I would have voted "nay"; on roll call 179 I was absent, and if present I would have voted "yea"; on roll call 182, if present, I would have voted "yea."

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

Mr. ROUTZOHN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD and include therewith a letter written to Edward M. Toland by Mr. William Green.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. RANDOLPH. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my own remarks in the RECORD and to include a press editorial.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. RICH. Mr. Speaker, I reserve the right to object. When the gentleman asks to insert an editorial I shall not object to the gentleman from West Virginia, as he is not guilty of placing much extraneous matter in the RECORD; but I rise to say this in reference to the objection made by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. SABATH]. If he will go over the RECORD of the last 2 weeks and see the amount of material placed therein by Members on the Democratic side of the House, one article which contained some forty-odd pages lauding Jim Farley, newspaper articles——

Mr. SABATH. From this side of the House?

Mr. RICH. Yes; from over there, in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD. There was one gentleman on the Democratic side who put in 9 articles containing the same thing with reference to nine counties in the State of Washington, which was nothing but political propaganda, over 40 pages; one insertion of 4½ pages should have been sufficient; and if the gentleman is going to permit that sort of stuff to go in, then why object to the request of the gentleman from Montana?

Mr. SABATH. If I had been here, I would have objected to it.

Mr. RICH. And if I had known that he was going to insert in the RECORD nine times practically the same article; change the name of the county as follows: Grays Harbor County, Cowlitz County, Clark County, Lewis County, Thurston County, Pacific County, Skamania County, Wakkiakum County, and Mason County, I would have objected to it, for I think it was a bad thing for the Member to do such a breach of good faith in using up space in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD.

Mr. SABATH. I am in accord with you that there have been abuses. I do not know of the one to which you refer, but many of those on the other side of the Capitol and those of the gentleman from Montana have abused the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD privilege and should not be tolerated.

Mr. RICH. When people ask to put in these political speeches, they ought to be objected to. In fact they should not ask for such permission.

Mr. SABATH. But some of the things that are put in are not only political speeches, but are much worse than political speeches.

Personally I do not object so much to political speeches on the part of Members especially when they are for home consumption, but I do object and we should condemn continuous insertions of malicious and willful accusations made for the purpose of creating racial and religious hatred and discord and, more so, when they tend to imitate the detestable Nazi creed.

Mr. RICH. Then you gentlemen on that side ought to watch the RECORD a little bit and try to keep it clean.

Mr. SABATH. That is what I was trying to do this morning, but I find it nearly impossible to continuously watch you on the other side.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from West Virginia?

There was no objection.

Mr. ANGELL. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks on two subjects and to include two editorials from a Portland paper, and a short article on the third term. With the other I ask unanimous consent to include an editorial from the Portland Oregonian, and also an article about Senator CHARLES L. MCNARY.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. LELAND M. FORD. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD and to include a news item from the Los Angeles Times headed "Threat charged in Bridges case."

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

HARRY M. BRIDGES

Mr. LELAND M. FORD. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for 1 minute.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. LELAND M. FORD. Mr. Speaker, I do this to direct attention of the Members to this news item about the threat charge in the Bridges case. There is a subheading which says " 'Reds' would try to tie up the deportation ship, Legionnaire declares." Then the article goes on to state that Communist Party leaders have threatened to stop the deportation of Harry Bridges, the west coast director of the C. I. O., in the event the bill to deport him is passed by the Congress.

This statement was made today by Homer L. Chaillaux, director of the National American Commission of the American Legion, before the Rotary Club:

> The latest threat from the Communist Party is that "we have machinery to make it impossible for Bridges to be deported by boat." They mean that they control the seamen's union on the west coast and will make it impossible to move any boat on which an attempt is made to ship Bridges.

This appears to be an intolerable situation in which the Communists of the country are defying Congress over this man Bridges. These Communists are receiving their greatest help and aid from a man who has sworn to uphold the law and do his duty, namely, Attorney General Jackson of the United States. We had hoped for better things after the miserable failure of Mme. Perkins, but apparently Jackson has just as much lack of enthusiasm and intestinal fortitude to do his duty as had Mme. Perkins.

SUBJECT OF EXTENSION OF REMARKS

Mr. THORKELSON. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for 1 minute.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. THORKELSON. Mr. Speaker, I have asked for this minute in order to inform the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. SABATH] that the statements which I have inserted in the RECORD are based on authenticated facts and statements made in and taken from publications issued by the gentleman's own people, the Zionist Review. I have copies of that paper, so that there is nothing strange about it, there is nothing queer about it. Those are the absolute facts as they appear in the press, and the House ought to see them. There is no reason in the world why any minority, no matter who they are, should dictate to the majority, and I say to the gentleman that the gentleman's own people, in organized minorities, are dictating to the American people, and it is now time that the people of the United States awaken to realize what is happening to this Nation. We are in the hands of a minority party. When he can sit there and object to information of that sort going into the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, which is based upon facts, it is time the Congress ceased to exist.

LINDSAY CARTER WARREN

Mr. McLEAN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for 1 minute.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. McLEAN. Mr. Speaker, I address myself to a subject on which both Republicans and Democrats can agree, Lindsay Carter Warren.

My excuse must be my appreciation of the benefits I have received from serving an apprenticeship under him as a member of the Committee on Accounts and the friendship which resulted.

Mr. Warren was elected to the House of Representatives from the First District of North Carolina to the Sixty-ninth Congress and served here continuously for 16 years until the day before yesterday, when his resignation was accepted. The President, imposing special trust and confidence in Mr. Warren, prevailed upon him to desert these legislative halls for an important position in the executive branch of the Government, that of Comptroller General of the United States.

He left us without valedictory. It was characteristic of him to sever his connection here and take up his new duties without ostentation, and perhaps this commendation would touch his sensibilities to such an extent as to be embarrassing, but my association with him has been such that I cannot let the occasion pass without notice.

The law under which he will serve was calculated to remove the Comptroller General from those influences which humankind is heir to. We all know, however, that it is impossible to legislate character, integrity, and administrative ability. These elements must be inherent in the individual, and those of us who have had contact with Mr. Warren know that the President has made a wise choice.

When I first came to Congress I was assigned to the Committee on Accounts, of which Mr. Warren was chairman. Although of the minority party, I was advised of the activities of the committee, was made familiar with all the matters pending before it, and the records were open to me for any details that I might desire. I felt myself fortunate in serving an apprenticeship under the chairmanship of a man of his knowledge of procedure, his sense of fairness, and genial personality.

Immediately upon graduation from the law school of the University of North Carolina in 1912, Mr. Warren entered upon an active and honorable professional and public career in his native State, which was to prepare him for his usefulness here, and here he attained distinction and importance.

As presiding officer, by designation of the Speaker, when the whole House was sitting as a Committee, which was frequent, his marked ability and knowledge of parliamentary procedure inspired the confidence of us all. In debate he was argumentative and forceful, frequently resorting to his sense of humor, illustrating his arguments with stories characteristic of his native South in the dialect he so well understood.

I think it will be difficult for Lindsay Warren to find contentment in the cloistered life of Comptroller General after the hurly-burly and excitement one experiences as a Member of this Chamber, but it is my hope, as I am certain it is the hope of us all, that there will come to him a full share of his utmost desires, whether it be in his present situation or in some higher calling in public or private life.

Our loss will be the gain of the executive branch of the Government. He will be missed as a legislator, but he will dignify and increase the importance of the administrative office to which he has been called. Our best wishes attend him. [Applause.]

SUBJECT OF EXTENSION OF REMARKS

Mr. SABATH. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for 1 minute.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. SABATH. Mr. Speaker, I objected to the unanimous-consent request of the gentleman from Montana [Mr. THORKELSON] to insert some articles in his statement because I have found in the past that many of his extensions of remarks were not based on facts, were without justification, were unfair and unwarranted.

Mr. THORKELSON. Mr. Speaker, I demand that the gentleman's words be taken down.

Mr. SABATH. Oh, sit down.

Mr. THORKELSON. I want his words taken down, Mr. Speaker. He has made the statement that my information is not based on facts. You sit down yourself. You are talking too much anyway.

Mr. SABATH. When I talk, I do not talk or insert nonsense.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will rule that if the words were taken down the Chair would hold that they did not infringe the rules as far as the statement so far has been made. The gentleman will proceed.

Mr. SABATH. Every Member knows what I have said is correct. The gentleman from Montana in the last few days, though he has been repudiated in his own district and defeated, has loaded down the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD with more than 12 pages of stuff unfit for the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD. He sends this misleading information out under his frank by the thousands at the expense of the American taxpayers, whom I know have no confidence in him.

The House will recall that in the Appendix of the RECORD, pages 3006–3010, I showed that he had placed in the RECORD up to that time 210 full pages of scurrilous matter at a cost of $9,400 to taxpayers. I showed that he had imposed upon the House by inserting in one of his leaves to print a forged letter of Col. E. M. House, confidant of the late Woodrow Wilson, in which Colonel House was placed in the false position of being in a conspiracy to restore the American Colonies to Great Britain. After that performance, and even before, I lost all confidence in him.

PATENT TO CERTAIN LANDS IN MINNESOTA

Mr. DEROUEN. Mr. Speaker, on July 1 the House passed by unanimous consent, H. R. 9732, relating to the issuance by the Secretary of the Interior of a patent to the State of Minnesota, for certain lands in that State. At the time of the passage of the House bill there was on the Speaker's desk an identical Senate bill, S. 3954. I was not present at that time, or I would have asked that the Senate bill be passed in lieu of the House bill.

I now ask unanimous consent, Mr. Speaker, for the immediate consideration of the bill S. 3954.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the title of the bill.

The Clerk read the title of the bill.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Louisiana?

Mr. MICHENER. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, as I understand the situation, these two bills are identical?

Mr. DEROUEN. Identical.

Mr. MICHENER. And it was simply an oversight or an inadvertence?

Mr. DEROUEN. That is correct.

Mr. MICHENER. One passed the House and the other passed the Senate?

Mr. DEROUEN. That is correct. The State of Minnesota has qualified and is ready to accept the land.

Mr. MICHENER. I have no objection.

Mr. RICH. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, what does this bill do?

Mr. DEROUEN. It is simply perfecting title. It is to remove a color of title.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There being no objection, the Clerk read the Senate bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Interior may cancel the patent issued on August 24, 1886, to Joe Blair, as allottee No. 4 of the Fond du Lac Indian Reservation, Minn., for the north half of the northeast quarter of section 30, township 49 north, range 17 west, of the fourth principal meridian in Minnesota, and may issue to the State of Minnesota as a fee-simple patent for the tract of land described. If issued, the fee-simple patent shall operate as a full and complete conveyance of any and all right, title, or interest that the heirs of Joe Blair, deceased allottee No. 4 of the Fond du Lac Indian Reservation, Minn., and that the United States of America may have in and to said described lands. Prior to the issuance of such patent, the Secretary of the Interior may require the State of Minnesota, at its expense, to furnish satisfactory evidence that there are no outstanding liens, encumbrances, or other conveyances of record against said lands other than the original patent issued under date of August 24, 1886, to the said Joe Blair covering the lands hereinabove described.

The bill was ordered to be read a third time, was read the third time, and passed.

A motion to reconsider was laid on the table.

BRIDGE ACROSS STRAITS OF MACKINAC, MICH.

Mr. LEA. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to take from the Speaker's table the bill (S. 1379) granting the consent of Congress to the Mackinac Straits Bridge Authority to construct, maintain, and operate a toll bridge or series of bridges, causeways, and approaches thereto, across the Straits of Mackinac at or near a point between St. Ignace, Mich., and the Lower Peninsula of Michigan, with House amendments, insist on the amendments of the House and agree to the conference asked by the Senate.

The Clerk read the title of the bill.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from California?

Mr. MICHENER. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, is that the Mackinac Straits Bridge?

Mr. LEA. Yes.

Mr. MICHENER. The gentleman from Michigan [Mr. DONDERO] is very much interested. He is temporarily absent from the floor. I ask the gentleman to withdraw his request until the gentleman from Michigan returns.

Mr. LEA. You understand that this is simply a request for the appointment of conferees?

Mr. MICHENER. Yes. It is the next step in the process of agreeing with the Senate, and I ask the gentleman to withdraw his request. If he does not, I will have to object.

Mr. LEA. I will withdraw the request for the time being, Mr. Speaker.

PERMISSION TO ADDRESS THE HOUSE

Mr. BREWSTER. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for 1 minute.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

Mr. JOHNS asked and was given permission to revise and extend his own remarks.

Mr. SHAFER of Michigan. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my own remarks in the RECORD and to include certain portions of a radio interview last night between Fulton Lewis, Jr., and a Member of the other body.

The SPEAKER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

There was no objection.

Mr. SHAFER of Michigan. Mr. Speaker, I also ask unanimous consent to extend my own remarks in the RECORD and to include an editorial.

The SPEAKER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

There was no objection.

Mr. THILL. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my own remarks in the RECORD and to include therein an editorial.

The SPEAKER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

There was no objection.

VETO MESSAGE FROM THE PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES RE WILSON A. KRAMER (H. DOC. NO. 910)

The SPEAKER. The Chair lays before the House the following message from the President of the United States:

To the House of Representatives:

I return herewith without my approval H. R. 6823, an act for the relief of Wilson A. Kramer.

The act provides that the named beneficiary shall hereafter be held and considered to have been mustered into the Federal military service on May 7, 1898, and honorably discharged October 29, 1898, whereas no record whatever of the man having performed any service is contained in the official records of the War Department nor the General Accounting

Office. In support of his position, the claimant has tendered affidavits, all of comparatively recent dates, to the effect that he served at some time during the period alleged.

I do not feel justified in giving my approval to this measure in the absence of any substantiating official-record evidence of such service.

FRANKLIN D. ROOSEVELT.

THE WHITE HOUSE, August 14, 1940.

The SPEAKER. The objections of the President will be spread at large upon the Journal.

Mr. MAY. Mr. Speaker, I move that the bill and the message be referred to the Committee on Military Affairs and ordered printed.

The SPEAKER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

There was no objection.

VETO MESSAGE FROM THE PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES RE UNITED STATES CUSTOMHOUSE, DETROIT, MICH. (H. DOC. NO. 911)

The SPEAKER. The Chair lays before the House the following message from the President of the United States:

To the House of Representatives:

I return herewith, without my approval, House Joint Resolution 472, to prohibit the sale or disposal of the United States customhouse for the city of Detroit.

The establishment concerned, the Federal Works Agency, has no intention of selling the customhouse. The provisions of existing law authorizing sales of surplus real estate are at present inapplicable, since the property is not surplus.

A project for additional stories on the new post office has been suspended for several months because of protests against the moving of customs activities, and the entire space situation in Detroit is being studied with a view to arriving at a solution acceptable to all Federal agencies concerned. Under the circumstances, the Federal Works Agency should not be handicapped in this effort by legislation such as House Joint Resolution 472.

FRANKLIN D. ROOSEVELT.

THE WHITE HOUSE, August 14, 1940.

The SPEAKER. The objections of the President will be spread at large upon the Journal.

Mr. LANHAM. Mr. Speaker, I move that the bill and the message be referred to the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds and ordered printed.

The SPEAKER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

There was no objection.

VETO MESSAGE FROM THE PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES—RE EDWARD F. HIGGINS (H. DOC. NO. 912)

The SPEAKER. The Chair lays before the House the following additional message from the President of the United States:

To the House of Representatives:

I return herewith, without my approval, H. R. 9520, entitled "An act for the relief of Edward F. Higgins, postmaster, Great Neck, N. Y."

The express purpose of the main body of the enactment is to allow credit in the accounts of Edward F. Higgins, postmaster at Great Neck, N. Y., for the amount of $1,453.23, representing unlawful payments of compensation made to Joseph Alexsey as a postal employee at Great Neck, N. Y., during the period July 1, 1938, to February 28, 1939, while he was an alien, the payments having been made in contravention of section 5 of the act of March 28, 1938 (52 Stat. 148). However, I am advised by the Acting Comptroller General of the United States that Joseph Alexsey has heretofore refunded to the United States the entire amount of the unlawful payments, namely, $1,453.23, and that the accounts of the postmaster in question have been credited with this amount. Hence, the enactment in its present form—no authority appearing therein for refund to the employee—would fail to accomplish any useful or proper purpose.

Under the circumstances, I have no alternative but to withhold my approval of the enactment.

FRANKLIN D. ROOSEVELT.

THE WHITE HOUSE, August 14, 1940.

The SPEAKER. The objections of the President will be spread at large upon the Journal.

Mr. RAMSPECK. Mr. Speaker, I move that the bill and the message be referred to the Committee on Claims and ordered printed.

The SPEAKER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

There was no objection.

FILIPINOS IN THE ARMY OF THE UNITED STATES

Mr. MAY. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to take from the Speaker's table the bill (H. R. 9158) to amend the act entitled "An act for the protection of certain enlisted men of the Army," approved August 19, 1937, and for other purposes, with a Senate amendment, and concur in the Senate amendment.

The Clerk read the title of the bill.

The Clerk read the Senate amendment, as follows:

Page 2, line 17, after "service", insert "Provided, That Filipinos who were serving in the Army on July 1, 1937, may be retained in the service under current enlistments and may be reenlisted without regard to their citizenship status, and may receive their proper pay and allowances under such enlistments and reenlistments."

Mr. MICHENER. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, has the chairman of the Committee on Military Affairs conferred with the minority members and other members of the committee?

Mr. MAY. Mr. Speaker, I have talked to some of the minority members of the Military Affairs Committee about it. The bill has been pending here for 2 or 3 weeks. I did not have an opportunity to speak to them about it this morning because I had to adjourn the hearing of the committee and rush over to the House.

The bill was reported unanimously by the House committee. Its purpose is to provide for the retention in the Army of about 700 men who on next Saturday, if the bill is not passed, will be retired from the service automatically.

The effect of the Senate amendment is to include certain enlisted Filipinos in the Army, principally as cooks.

Mr. MICHENER. Further reserving the right to object, this is a technical bill, one that the House generally cannot understand by explanation, but may I ask the gentleman from New York, the ranking minority member of the Military Affairs Committee, if this bill in the form in which it is now presented as amended by the Senate meets with the approval of the minority members of the committee?

Mr. ANDREWS. It was reported unanimously.

Mr. MICHENER. And it is the opinion of the minority members that the amendment should be agreed to?

Mr. ANDREWS. It was unanimously agreed to in the committee.

Mr. MICHENER. Then, certainly I shall not object.

Mr. STEFAN. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, will the chairman of the Military Affairs Committee tell us whether or not this bill refers to members of the Philippine Scouts located in the Philippine Islands as well as to those in the regular service of the Army?

Mr. MAY. That is right.

Mr. STEFAN. Does it relate to the Filipinos employed principally as cooks in the Army?

Mr. MAY. It takes care of both.

Mr. RICH. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, on what date would they be retired if this bill did not pass?

Mr. MAY. I do not have that information. There are about 700 of them.

Mr. RICH. Are they to be retired on account of age or service?

Mr. MAY. On account of certain conditions under which they enlisted.

Mr. STEFAN. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield further?

Mr. MAY. I yield.

Mr. STEFAN. So far as the Philippine Scouts are concerned they are entitled to the same retirement benefits as any other American soldier.

Mr. MAY. Certainly. There is not and should not be any discrimination between them.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Kentucky?

There was no objection.

The Senate amendment was agreed to.

A motion to reconsider was laid on the table.

ORDERING NATIONAL GUARD, RESERVES, AND RETIRED PERSONNEL INTO ACTIVE MILITARY SERVICE

Mr. SMITH of Virginia. Mr. Speaker, by direction of the Committee on Rules, I call up House Resolution 567, and ask for its immediate consideration.

The Clerk read the resolution, as follows:

House Resolution 567

Resolved, That immediately upon the adoption of this resolution it shall be in order to move that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for consideration of Senate Joint Resolution 286, a joint resolution to strengthen the common defense and to authorize the President to order members and units of reserve components and retired personnel of the Regular Army into active military service. That after general debate, which shall be confined to the joint resolution and shall continue not to exceed 4 hours, to be equally divided and controlled by the chairman and ranking minority member of the Committee on Military Affairs, the joint resolution shall be read for amendment under the 5-minute rule. At the conclusion of the reading of the joint resolution for amendment, the Committee shall rise and report the same to the House with such amendments as may have been adopted, and the previous question shall be considered as ordered on the joint resolution and amendments thereto to final passage without intervening motion except one motion to recommit, with or without instructions.

Mr. SMITH of Virginia. Mr. Speaker, this is a rule for the consideration of the bill authorizing the President to call into active military service the Reserve officers and the State militia. The bill has passed the Senate. The rule provides for 4 hours' general debate. It is an open rule, with the most liberal provisions for amendments to be offered on the floor. As far as I know, there is no objection to the adoption of the rule itself.

I yield one-half of my time to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. ALLEN], if he desires the time. If not, I shall move the previous question.

Mr. ALLEN of Illinois. Mr. Speaker, inasmuch as there is no opposition to the rule on this side, I yield back my time.

Mr. SMITH of Virginia. Mr. Speaker, if there are no requests for time, I move the previous question.

The previous question was ordered.

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the resolution.

The resolution was agreed to.

Mr. MAY. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of Senate Joint Resolution 286, to strengthen the common defense and to authorize the President to order members and units of Reserve components and retired personnel of the Regular Army into active military service.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the House resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of Senate Joint Resolution 286, with Mr. WOODRUM of Virginia in the chair.

The Clerk read the title of the joint resolution.

The first reading of the joint resolution was dispensed with.

Mr. MAY. Mr. Chairman, I yield myself 30 minutes, and desire to be notified when I have spoken for 15 minutes.

Mr. Chairman, the Military Affairs Committee of the House bring this joint resolution (S. J. Res. 286) to the floor under a unanimous report, but I feel I should make some brief explanation of the procedure by which the measure comes to the floor.

The Committee on Military Affairs held hearings covering many days on the question of calling out the National Guard. In addition to that, we have been in session for several weeks on a companion bill, commonly referred to as the Burke-Wadsworth bill, sometimes called a conscription bill. The hearings on both measures are somewhat interlocked with each other, but on June 10 the House Military Committee reported a bill authorizing the President to order the National Guard and the other civilian components of the Army into the active service for a period of not exceeding 12 months, and authorizing such action on the part of the President up to and including June 30, 1942. During the pendency of the bill which it reported to the House the committee was enabled to take up the Senate bill, Senate Joint Resolution 286. On that we conducted further hearings, and after very careful consideration of all of its provisions we wrote into the Senate joint resolution certain amendments, which I shall undertake to explain to the membership of the House.

As I have already stated, the bill authorized the President from time to time to order into active military training for a period of 12 months each any and all members and units of any or all Reserve components of the Army of the United States, including the retired personnel.

When the House committee came to consider the Senate joint resolution, the first amendment which we placed in the bill and which we thought very vital and necessary was an amendment with respect to the provision which authorized the National Labor Relations Board to consider as an unfair labor practice the failure of any industrial employer to restore at the expiration of his period of service an enrollee to his former job. This amendment, having been considered by the committee, it was decided to strike out the portion of the Senate amendment relating to the National Labor Relations Board and vest in the district courts of the United States the power and authority to hear any complaint by any enrollee who might be denied his job at the expiration of his 12 months of training.

The basic ground upon which this measure is presented is the fact that due to world conditions and to the imminent and constant threat of major difficulties for the United States, not only in continental United States but possibly in other parts of the Western Hemisphere, the committee feels this legislation is needed. This is not only proven by the evidence heard on this particular measure but by a vast amount of uncontradicted proof which we have heard on the proposal to pass a compulsory service selection bill.

The question arose in the first bill which we reported as to whether or not the National Guard might be called to service beyond the limits of continental United States. Upon consideration of the question whether it might be called beyond the limits of continental United States, the House committee first reported a bill confining this authority to continental United States, the Panama Canal Zone, Puerto Rico, and the Hawaiian Islands. Subsequently the President sent an urgent message to the Speaker of the House and also to the Senate in which he emphasized very earnestly the need for authority to call them in an emergency beyond the continental United States and to all of our foreign possessions, including the Philippine Islands. After hearing all of the facts relating to the situation throughout the Western Hemisphere and the all-important and I might say alarming situation that is continuing to develop in Europe, your committee has concurred in the Senate provision which authorizes the President not only to call them into active service for continental United States, but into service anywhere in the Western Hemisphere, including Puerto Rico, and the Hawaiian and Philippine Islands. We feel that provision is vitally important.

Let us assume that a difficulty arises in Mexico, which is not continental United States. Let us assume that some foreign foe obtained a land or naval base or an army base somewhere in Mexico. If the bill had been restricted to continental United States and the President had no power or authority to call the National Guard for use beyond continental United States we would have been shut off at the Rio Grande, which might have made it possible and probably would make it possible, for any foreign foe with designs upon the United States to make a complete conquest of Mexico, set up a foreign border by an antagonistic enemy along the Rio Grande, and the same thing with reference to the 3,000 miles of border line between Canada and the United States.

Now, on the question of those who are called for training for a period of 12 months, the House committee reconsidered a certain amendment which the Senate placed in the bill, which provided, in substance, that when an enrollee had returned to his civilian employment and to his job in private industry, the matter should be taken before the National Labor Relations Board for consideration, or at least in an effort to give that Board the power to pass upon the question. In lieu of that the House committee provided "any member of any Reserve component of the Army of the United States"—I am on the wrong amendment. The one I am reading now relates to the automatic or mandatory discharge of a member of the National Guard within 20 days after his enlistment in the service, and here is what we provided:

Any member of any Reserve component of the Army of the United States who has any person or persons dependent solely upon him for support and who has no other means of support except the wages or salary he can earn shall be discharged upon his own request made within 20 days of the date of his entry into the active military service of the United States.

Mr. BULWINKLE. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MAY. Yes; I will yield there.

Mr. BULWINKLE. I would like to ask the gentleman two questions about the reservation that you have there, and one is, What do you mean by "Reserve component of the Army"?

Mr. MAY. That means the Reserve officers and the Reserve Officers' Corps and the enlisted Reserve that have been brought in under the Enlisted Reserve Act that we passed a few years ago, and all of the National Guard.

Mr. BULWINKLE. Is it customary to refer to the National Guard as a Reserve component of the Regular Army? Does not the gentleman think it would be far better to say "any member of the National Guard or any Reserve component of the Army"?

Mr. MAY. Such an amendment might have the effect of distinguishing very clearly the National Guard from the Reserve Corps.

Mr. BULWINKLE. Well, it is distinguished until it is actually in service, and such a man is not in actual service. He has 20 days before that time. I want the gentleman to think about that; and then there is another matter in there. What do you mean by the words "except the wages or salary he can earn"? Does that refer to the wages and salaries in the Army?

Mr. MAY. The language is so simple and direct on that, I do not think the gentleman——

Mr. BULWINKLE. I agree with the gentleman that the language is simple, but it would be far better if you would strike out on line 6, after the word "support" the words "except the wages or salary he can earn," because here is a case, for instance, of a young lieutenant making $133 a month, if he has gone into the Army. He may have an invalid wife and he may be making only $100 a month in civilian life.

Mr. MAY. The language as written in the bill by the committee aims to protect and does protect the enrollee against——

Mr. BULWINKLE. If the gentleman——

Mr. MAY. If the gentleman is not going to give me time to answer, I shall decline to yield further.

The amendment which we have written in here, which states "except the wages or salary he can earn," refers to the salary or the wages that he is earning in private industry at this time and before he is called; and in answer to the gentleman's other question, based on his knowledge of the law and his experience in Congress and his experience in the Army, I do not think it is necessary for me to elaborate on the fact that the National Guard, until called into the Federal service, constitutes the State militia or State troops and not Federal troops.

Mr. BULWINKLE. Oh, no; under the Constitution it is a part of the organized militia of the United States and not the State militia.

Mr. MAY. No; until called into active service by the President, in pursuance of a declaration of war by the Congress, or a declaration of an emergency.

Mr. BULWINKLE. Let me ask the gentleman one more question. I asked the gentleman about the case of a second lieutenant that makes $133 a month, I believe, when he is in the service.

Mr. MAY. Yes.

Mr. BULWINKLE. He is making $100 a month in civilian life, but he has an invalid wife that he has to stay with at home and in that case is somebody going to judge whether the wages in the Army are a little higher than in civil life, and if so, that he should go into the Army?

Mr. MAY. Under this bill, when he goes back to his $100 job, if he should be discharged from the Army at the end of a 12-month training period, he would go back at the salary that he had before. Furthermore, he may be discharged at his own request within 20 days.

Mr. BULWINKLE. Will he be discharged before he goes in on this 20-day proposition?

Mr. MAY. I will say to the gentleman from North Carolina that the committee did everything it could and all it knows how to do to try to protect the enrollee when he is returned to private life in the enjoyment of his life or in the enjoyment of the business he has, and if there is any way by which we can do it better we would be glad to do it.

Mr. LELAND M. FORD. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MAY. I yield to the gentleman from California.

Mr. LELAND M. FORD. My question is pertinent to that particular point. I am not opposing the bill, but is there anything in the measure that protects these men against what may be their obligation, for instance, under a contract for the purchase of real estate? Should there not be a moratorium declared for the time they are in the service? Has that matter been taken care of?

Mr. MAY. I may say to the gentleman that simultaneously with the reporting of this bill after all the hearings had been completed upon it the War Department voluntarily came forward with a proposal to enlarge upon section 4 of the bill, which was known as the Overton amendment in the Senate, and which enlarges the rights of these enrollees and protects them under the act of March 8, 1918, under what was known during the World War as the Civil Rights Act. That act embraced everything, including their proper protection in court procedure, except the question of preserving their domicile, the place of residence, on the subject of rents accruing, and also on one other item relating to insurance. The War Department has brought to the committee for consideration a lengthy bill on the subject, enlarging the civil rights of the soldier, in addition to all the protection to which he was entitled under the act of 1918. I did introduce such a bill and hearings have been held on it. There will probably be no objection to it, but it was felt that it did not properly belong in this measure.

Mr. LELAND M. FORD. In other words, that will be taken care of?

Mr. MAY. Yes; undoubtedly.

Mr. LEWIS of Colorado. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MAY. I yield to the gentleman from Colorado.

Mr. LEWIS of Colorado. Do the words "wages or salary" as stated in the bill in line 6, on page 5, cover the professional earnings of a doctor or a lawyer? If I recall correctly, the Selective Service Act of 1917, in referring to dependents of persons drawn in the draft, described them as persons who were "mainly dependent on the labor" of the person drafted "for their support." Is that included in the words "wages or salary"?

Mr. MAY. The committee was of the opinion that the phrase used, "wages or salary," was all inclusive, and that it would apply to a man who was a professional man; that even though it was earnings, that would be construed as either salary or wages, one or the other, and that the phrase would cover in any case.

Mr. LEWIS of Colorado. The explanatory statement just made by the gentleman, I believe, would be considered by any court in construing the words "wages or salary," as indicating the intent of Congress.

Mr. MAY. I thank the gentleman.

Mr. COLE of Maryland. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MAY. I yield to the gentleman from Maryland.

Mr. COLE of Maryland. Section 3 (b), subsection (B), provides:

> If such position was in the employ of a private employer, such employer shall restore such person to such position or to a position of like seniority status and pay unless the employer's circumstances have so changed as to make it impossible or unreasonable to do so.

In section 3 (c) the committee has recommended that the district courts of the United States shall be open to these young men to apply by petition against the private employer. As the bill passed the Senate, I understand, every soldier leaving the service who had a grievance against the private employer had the agency of the Federal Government, at the expense of the Federal Government, to guarantee his day in court and the security of his job. I am wondering if the gentleman does not believe that under this language—and I personally agree with what the committee has done—it is not fair to provide legal services for these men when they leave the service if they find a hard-boiled employer who is not going to play the game.

Mr. MAY. I may say to the gentleman from Maryland very frankly that after we reported the bill I had another thought about it. I thought that possibly if a soldier, discharged at the end of his 12-month period of service, had difficulty in agreeing with his former employer with regard to being restored to his job, he ought at least be permitted to sue in forma pauperis, if that were necessary, but the committee had not included that in the bill and I did not feel authorized as chairman of the committee to do it without conference with the committee. It may be that in conference that kind of consideration will be given to it.

Mr. COLE of Maryland. Then the gentleman has nothing in mind as to the advisability of an amendment to this language?

Mr. MAY. I certainly do. I am not precluding anybody from any wise amendment that will protect the soldier. I have felt all the while that if we got this bill through and it went to conference, which it would have to do as amended, whatever amendments the House puts on it we can work out in conference.

Mr. THOMAS F. FORD. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MAY. I yield to the gentleman from California.

Mr. THOMAS F. FORD. With regard to the term "military service," if a man serves a year and then is discharged, is he immediately available if you want to call him back?

Mr. MAY. There is a provision in the other bill that if at any time during his call to service he wished to join the Regular Army he could do so, or if at the end of his training period he wished to retire to private life and go back to his job he could do so. He is subject to reenlistment if he wishes to do that.

Mr. THOMAS F. FORD. He could voluntarily reenlist?

Mr. MAY. Certainly, he could.

Mr. THOMAS F. FORD. But he would not be subject to the 12 months of training?

Mr. MAY. No.

Mr. VAN ZANDT. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MAY. I yield to the gentleman from Pennsylvania.

Mr. VAN ZANDT. In regard to the provision of the bill which concerns the restoration of jobs to enrollees, does the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. MAY] understand that at the close of the World War many World War veterans were returned to their positions only to find during their absence a young man had developed a lot of ability and perhaps more ability than had the World War veteran, with the result that the World War veteran was not only displaced from his position but eventually squeezed out entirely? Now what I would like to know is this: Does the Federal court have jurisdiction to the extent that the enrollee's job will not only be returned to him, but will the court keep him in his job for a few years at least, or will they squeeze him out like they did the World War veteran?

Mr. MAY. The gentleman means protect the veteran of the World War who has been discriminated against?

Mr. VAN ZANDT. No, the enrollee's service.

Mr. MAY. The enrollee, or the man who is called as a member of the National Guard or the Reserve?

Mr. VAN ZANDT. Yes.

Mr. MAY. And what the gentleman wants to know is whether or not it will go beyond the period of a year and protect him?

Mr. VAN ZANDT. That is correct.

Mr. MAY. So far as the legislation is concerned as it now is, it relates only to the year's service.

Mr. VAN ZANDT. Does not the gentleman think the enrollee is entitled to the protection of the Government until he has rehabilitated himself and established himself in a permanent position?

Mr. MAY. The measure I referred to a while ago takes care of that, when we get through, but it was so lengthy and required so much consideration that we felt it ought to be given careful consideration and be written so that it would certainly guarantee the rights of the enrollee, and for that reason we are considering it separately from this.

Mr. VAN ZANDT. That is the Soldiers and Sailors Civil Relief Act?

Mr. MAY. Yes.

Mr. KELLER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MAY. Yes.

Mr. KELLER. It occurs to me it might be wise to give these men the same status as the laboringman has under the N. L. R. B. and let that organization handle that situation. Would not that be wise?

Mr. MAY. We thought that inasmuch as the Labor Relations Act provides that that Board might on hearing of facts determine what constitutes an unfair labor practice, that it would be unwise in the bill to declare as a matter of law that it is an unfair labor practice for an employer to decline to reemploy a man when he returns from the service. There is a further provision in the bill providing that the situation of the employer may have changed. For instance, the employer may have gone into bankruptcy pending the tenure of the man in the service and, of course, he could not reemploy the man, and the court having the matter in custody would not be able to provide for that.

Mr. KELLER. And the gentleman feels that the bill coming after this will take care of those things?

Mr. MAY. Yes.

Mr. HINSHAW. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MAY. Yes.

Mr. HINSHAW. In view of the fact that the minimum age for enlistment in the Army is 18 years, and also that there are members of the National Guard who are under 18 years of age and still in school, would it not be possible to limit this call to those 18 years of age, for members of the National Guard?

Mr. MAY. It would be possible to do it, but the committee has not so decided.

Mr. HINSHAW. Did the committee discuss that subject?

Mr. MAY. That has been discussed, and the kindred question of providing for deferment of students of military schools. That has also been discussed.

Mr. HINSHAW. What is the gentleman's opinion about that sort of a provision?

Mr. MAY. I am not averse to it, but I will say this, that it is being considered carefully in the conscription bill not yet reported.

Mr. HINSHAW. But this particular bill calls out the Reserve, and there are some boys I know of who are not 18 years of age, who are still in school. They will be called out of school at this time, whereas otherwise they might complete their high-school term.

Mr. MAY. There are some cases of that kind that would constitute a hardship. It is almost impossible to enact such legislation as this without imposing hardship in some cases.

Mr. HINSHAW. They can enlist at 16 years of age in the National Guard in my State.

Mr. MAY. There are some cases of that kind, but so far as I can tell from the evidence, they are not numerous enough to provide for a particular exemption.

Mrs. ROGERS of Massachusetts. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MAY. Yes. I am happy to yield to the gentlewoman.

Mrs. ROGERS of Massachusetts. My understanding is that under the present law when the President calls in the National Guard or the Reserves, they may have the privilege of war-risk insurance. In other words, they may take out war-risk insurance 15 days after they are called into the service, so that it will not be necessary to pass a separate

Mr. MAY. If the War Risk Insurance Act is still effective, bill to give these men the benefit of the war-risk insurance. and I understand it is, it will not be necessary.

Mrs. ROGERS of Massachusetts. I was told that it was in effect this morning.

Mr. MAY. That is correct.

Mr. HALLECK. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MAY. Yes.

Mr. HALLECK. There are a few matters that I want to get cleared up, and that I want to inquire about, but before I do that I suggest there has been some doubt, as the chairman of the Committee on Military Affairs knows, as to whether or not the Reserve components include the National Guard. On page 67 of the National Defense Act of 1920, published in 1940, it is specifically provided that the National Guard shall be considered as a Reserve component of the Army.

Mr. MAY. Yes.

Mr. HALLECK. Of course, I have been disturbed about boys from 18 to 21 years of age who are in the guard, who will be subject to call if this act passes, when, as I understand it, the Conscription Act is designed to include only those boys 21 years and over. Has the committee given any consideration to that matter other than as indicated to the gentleman from California [Mr. HINSHAW]?

Mr. MAY. We have not given consideration to it except to have a hearing, and we will consider that question when we come to drafting the bill finally. Of course there will be many changes in the Burke-Wadsworth bill relating to compulsory military training. I would not like to say what the committee will do about it at this time.

Mr. HALLECK. There is a matter about which I like to inquire further, because a number of the members of the guard have communicated with me, and some of them did not understand when they joined the guard that this thing might happen to them. I observe that in the President's message, he says that "the guard comprises a body of men who have voluntarily assumed an obligation to serve the Nation in any crisis."

In trying to find out just what might have been contemplated by these men when they joined the guard, I turn to the Defense Act again, in section 111, and I find this:

> When Congress shall have declared a national emergency and shall have authorized the use of armed land forces of the United States for any purpose requiring the use of troops in excess of those of the Regular Army, the President may, under such regulations, including such physical examination as he may prescribe, order into the active military service of the United States, to serve therein for the period of the war or emergency, unless sooner relieved, any or all units and [the] members [thereof] of the National Guard of the United States.

I would like to inquire, Is it fair to say that that fixed the obligation that might have been contemplated by an enrollee of the guard at the time he did enroll?

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Kentucky has expired.

Mr. MAY. Mr. Chairman, I yield myself 5 additional minutes.

Of course, the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. HALLECK] understands that the House Military Affairs Committee had no way of determining what was in the minds of the men who joined the National Guard years ago, or months ago, or today, but we proceeded upon the theory that nearly everybody who joined the guard was an intelligent, patriotic man, and when he did it he joined with the expectation of meeting any emergency that might arise. The gentleman knows that when they are resident in a State and before there is any emergency declared by Congress or any war declared by Congress, they are frequently called by the Governors of the States for service in shut-out strikes to suppress insurrections and disturbances in the States. Consequently the gentleman will have to know that when a man joined the National Guard he did it like the man who gets married—"for better or for worse" [laughter]; and that he is subject to call at any time by the President of the United States when the Congress declares an emergency.

Mr. HALLECK. I recognize that a member of the guard did contemplate that he might be called by his State in certain contingencies. The thing I am inquiring about is the present situation which has to do with the calling of the guard into the Federal service. I do not mean hereby to say that I am for or against this bill. The thing I am trying to find out is just what there may be, if anything, in some of the things that have been said. For instance, one guard officer in my district writes me this:

> If the guard is mobilized without a chance for resignation of officers who have a profession to look after or a job which no one else can fill, it is going to create a severe hardship on them. I would be ready to sacrifice anything in the event of war, but believe that I have done my duty in the past by giving 2 weeks a year and 1 night a week for the past 10 years so that I could be in a state of preparedness in case of a real national emergency. I never would have kept up my commission if I had known I might be mobilized in peacetime just to fill in a gap resulting from failure to expand the Regular Army.

Mr. MAY. Now, let me say to the gentleman from Indiana that the gentleman who wrote that letter discloses the fact that if he had known there was going to be a national emergency or if the Congress was going to declare war, I think he states there that he would not have joined the guard [Laughter.] Perhaps I misunderstood the gentleman's reading of the letter.

Mr. HALLECK. I think this statement is a pretty fair statement. Has the Congress of the United States at this time declared any such national emergency as is contemplated by the National Defense Act which created the National Guard?

Mr. MAY. The Congress of the United States, by the passage of this resolution recognizes that such an emergency may arise and we want the guardsmen to have training for their own protection.

Mr. MASON. That is it exactly.

Mr. MAY. The emergency already threatens, as the gentleman from Indiana well knows. This is merely a bill to provide for any future emergency of whatever character.

Mr. HALLECK. Does this act declare such an emergency as is contemplated by the section I have just read?

Mr. MAY. I think that under the National Defense Act, the section which you have read, and under the provisions of this bill it constitutes a declaration of a condition or situation that threatens to develop into national emergency, and I think that the evidence and the conditions that exist fully and wholly warrant it.

Mr. FADDIS and Mr. ANDREWS rose.

Mr. MAY. Mr. Chairman, I yield first to the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. FADDIS].

Mr. FADDIS. A further answer to the inquiry of the gentleman from Indiana is the fact that Congress has made these appropriations, thus giving notice that there is an emergency.

Mr. MAY. I was about to mention that myself. I think that constitutes a declaration of emergency. I now yield to the gentleman from New York [Mr. ANDREWS].

Mr. MAY. Mr. Chairman, I yield myself 5 additional minutes, and then I will relinquish the floor.

Mr. ANDREWS. I may say to the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. HALLECK] that as I understand the situation of his constituent there is nothing to prevent his withdrawing from the service if he wants to.

Mr. HALLECK. I would like to be very sure about that. From my reading of the law I am not sure.

Mr. ANDREWS. All the testimony before the committee is clearly to that effect. Any officer in the National Guard can resign if he feels so inclined.

Mr. HALLECK. Do I understand from the chairman that that is his understanding also?

Mr. MAY. Yes; that is my understanding; also, let me answer the gentleman's inquiry this way, that under this bill there will be numerous regulations issued by the War Department and by Executive order of the President. Under those regulations no hardship will be imposed on any man.

Furthermore, the testimony shows that it is not the purpose of the War Department or the President to call the entire National Guard at once. They will be called in increments of possibly 50,000 to 60,000, the first being called the 1st of October if the bill is passed, the second being called in April; and along with them, if the conscription bill is passed, they will call the enrollees who are enrolled under that act, for training by the officers of the National Guard and the Regular Army.

Mr. HALLECK. That was my understanding, but I read in the press last night a suggestion on the part of some high Army officer that the present plan is to call out all of the guard and possibly to forego the so-called conscription act.

Mr. MAY. I do not know what the present plan is, I have not been advised by the War Department as to that; but I do know there is no intention on the part of the War Department either to call the National Guard or the civilian components of the Regular Establishment any faster than they are able to provide housing, equipment, and arms for training.

Further, if the conscription bill is passed nobody will be called under that to be trained by the National Guard until such time as ample housing facilities, arms, equipment, and clothing are made available.

Mr. VAN ZANDT. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MAY. I yield.

Mr. VAN ZANDT. Is it not true that the National Guard remains a State unit until they are mustered into the Federal service?

Mr. MAY. The gentleman is correct.

Mr. VAN ZANDT. Is it not true that any officer may resign from the National Guard until the units are federalized?

Mr. MAY. They may resign today, tomorrow, or any time prior to the passage of this act.

Mr. O'CONNOR. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MAY. I yield.

Mr. O'CONNOR. Did the committee give any thought to this situation: The Federal courts have jurisdiction in certain cases. Assuming that the employer of an enrollee is not engaged in any business affected by interstate commerce, would the provision with respect to extending jurisdiction to the United States district courts have any force or weight in the absence of the employer's being engaged in interstate commerce or in a business affected by interstate commerce?

Mr. MAY. I would say that, even though the employers were engaged purely in intrastate commerce, not in any way engaged in interstate commerce, the district court would still have jurisdiction to hear and determine any controversy that might arise between the man and his employer over the operation of these military measures.

Mr. O'CONNOR. I would suggest to the gentlemen of the committee that they consider the question of giving the State courts concurrent jurisdiction with the Federal courts in such cases as those where the employer is not engaged in interstate commerce or in any business affected by interstate commerce.

Mr. MAY. We felt that inasmuch as this was a Federal statute, enacted by the Federal Congress, that jurisdiction should be given to the Federal courts.

Mr. O'CONNOR. But the Federal courts may not have jurisdiction if the employer is not engaged in interstate commerce. I want to see the enrollee given full protection on conclusion of his service.

Mr. MICHENER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MAY. I yield.

Mr. MICHENER. In the colloquy between the chairman of the committee, Mr. MAY, and the gentleman from Indiana, Mr. HALLECK, I understood the chairman of the committee to concede that the contract of enlistment which the National Guard men have with the Federal Government is predicated upon an emergency declared by Congress, that the National Guard may not be legally called until such an emergency is declared; and I understood the chairman to suggest that the emergency was declared in this bill. Is that correct?

Mr. MAY. I did not say it was declared in this bill. I said that the enactment of this bill would constitute a recognition of the fact that we are preparing for any emergency that may arise. This is based upon the fact that when the President asked the Congress for the enactment of this legislation the very first thing he said in that message was this:

> The increasing seriousness of the international situation demands that every element of our defense structure be brought, as rapidly as possible, to the highest state of efficiency, in training as well as in equipment and matériel.

In view of that statement of the President, when he recommended to the Congress, as he had a right to do, this legislation, plus the fact that we have already appropriated twelve or thirteen billion dollars for defense purposes, I think the question answers itself.

Mr. MAY. Mr. Chairman, I yield myself 1 additional minute.

Mr. MICHENER. We will try to get the gentleman some time from this side.

Mr. MAY. There are 2 hours over there.

Mr. MICHENER. We want the gentleman to take the time because he is the chairman of the committee, who is supposed to know about this bill, and we are trying to find out. Does the gentleman contend that a letter written by the President to the Congress is in itself sufficient declaration by Congress of a national emergency?

Mr. MAY. The gentleman knows I meant no such thing.

Mr. MICHENER. I am asking the gentleman.

Mr. MAY. The gentleman knows furthermore, and every intelligent man and lady in this House, and they are all highly intelligent, knows the conditions that exist in this country and in foreign countries and the fact that the President was able, based on his wide knowledge and understanding, to say that a situation exists justifying the calling of the National Guard in time of peace, if you want to call it that, would make it seem easy for the gentleman from Michigan to know that when we pass this act that it constitutes a declaration of a situation bordering on an emergency. I will say on my own responsibility that a grave emergency does exist throughout the world.

Mr. ARENDS. Mr. Chairman, I yield 5 minutes to the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. MICHENER].

Mr. MICHENER. Mr. Chairman, I have asked for 5 minutes in order to finish interrogating the chairman of the Committee on Military Affairs. Let us get this thing right now.

The gentleman from Michigan's understanding is that there can be no emergency as defined in the statute read by the gentleman from Indiana unless the Congress declares in specific language that there is such an emergency. The gentleman from Kentucky insists that because the President has written a letter stating that in his opinion certain facts exist in the country such statement warrants the Congress in taking judicial notice of the fact that an emergency does exist. There can be no emergency as contemplated by the law, cited by the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. HALLECK], unless the Congress specifically declares that there is such an emergency. It seems to me it is twaddle to try to figure out any other kind of emergency. Why leave doubt when we can make certain by stating in unmistakable language?

I realize that back in September last the President did declare that there existed a "limited emergency," and I am convinced that the President put that word "limited" in there because he had no right to declare the type of an emergency contemplated in the law. A "limited emergency" is a New Deal phrase. No one knows what it comprehends. If the gentleman from Kentucky will make a search of some of the legislation that has been recently passed by the Congress for national-defense purposes, I doubt not that he will find tucked away in some of that legislation the emergency authority which he does not know exists and which the statute contemplated by the pending bill will not contain. Let us be frank and open about this thing. If we follow the law as he says it now is, we must declare an emergency before the National Guard can be called out for training if we keep faith with the guardsmen.

Mr. MAY. I will be as frank and open about it as the gentleman from Michigan. The gentleman has asked me a question, the ramifications of which I cannot unravel. But may I say that regardless of whether an emergency is declared by the Congress or not, one does exist, and, in addition to that, this is a preventive measure, not for the purpose of engaging in any military campaign, but to get the National Guard into the service for further training in preparation for the calling of other men for training as the situation grows more grave from time to time.

Mr. MICHENER. I think I have yielded long enough. My time is short.

If what the gentleman says is true, why do you not put in this bill the plain language declaring an emergency? I mean if the kind of an emergency exists, that necessitates the presence of the National Guard in the Federal service. I am in favor of proper training, I am in favor of adequate national defense, but I am not in favor of reading something into the bill that is not there and which legally will not be held to be there.

Mr. MAY. Does the gentleman want me to answer the question?

Mr. MICHENER. Yes; if he will answer the question and not discuss the merits of the bill.

Mr. MAY. The gentleman said he was in favor of this type of legislation.

Mr. MICHENER. No; not exactly that. There is a difference between training and this legislation.

Mr. MAY. He is of that opinion evidently, because he regards the emergency such as to make that desirable.

Mr. MICHENER. It does not make any difference what I may think about the emergency. It does not make any difference what the gentleman thinks about that. There are 435 Members here, and these 435 Members may have 435 different notions as to whether or not an emergency does exist. We should place in the bill, and in the statute, that which the law itself says we must place in the law before we have the right to call out the National Guard and send it into 1 year's training. There must be a proclamation of the emergency as the cornerstone before the power to call the National Guard into Federal service can be operative.

Mr. SCHAFER of Wisconsin. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MICHENER. I yield to the gentleman from Wisconsin.

Mr. SCHAFER of Wisconsin. What is this emergency, except the President's third-term "blitzkrieg"?

Mr. MICHENER. I am not discussing that. If this emergency exists why let the President rather than the Congress determine the matter?

This word "emergency" has become not only a household word but the word most commonly used in debate in the Congress during the last 7 years. We have gone from one emergency to the other, if we follow the trend of legislation; that is, one statute after another has been enacted on the statement that an emergency existed, and on this plea the new law was justified. The Congress has become emergency minded. Some of us have been wondering, within the last few weeks, if the term "national defense" is not being substituted and vitalized to relieve the people from the monotonous term "emergency." A lot of sins have been committed in the name of emergency. More will be committed in the name of national defense.

Be that as it may, however, if in the opinion of the Congress an emergency, as contemplated by the Constitution and the statutes, does exist, then let us come out frankly, openly, and honestly and make the declaration. On the other hand, if there is no emergency, then there is no occasion for any such declaration. Honesty is the best policy in giving the reason for any legislation, anywhere, anyhow, and anytime.

Now, the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. MAY], chairman of the Military Affairs Committee, concedes that no emergency, as contemplated by the statutes, has been determined by the Congress, and that there is no language in this pending bill making any such declaration. He excuses this failure on the sole ground that the President has sent a message to Congress reciting conditions which, in his opinion, constitute an emergency. Therefore, the chairman hopes in some vague and uncertain way to connect up this legislation with the President's message.

I do not want to repeat, but it does seem that it would be much easier for the Congress just to write into the law that which we all know should be there if the enlisted men and the officers in the National Guard are to be given the treatment they were guaranteed by the law when they enlisted.

I realize that the law referred to by the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. HALLECK] is a statute and not a part of the Constitution. A statute may, of course, be changed or repealed by a statute, and someone has had the temerity to suggest that since this resolution, by indirection, changes and repeals the existing law governing the National Guard that is all that is necessary, regardless of the contract which the National Guard man has with his Government. You know, I cannot get away from the old-fashioned notion that people should keep their contracts. I still believe that this applies to the Federal Government. Every time our Government, by legislative action or judicial interpretation, disregards the sanctity of a contract made between our Government and its people, then another link in the national chain of democracy has been weakened, if not destroyed.

There is an opportunity here to write into this bill what we mean. If there is an emergency and if it is necessary let us do it, and be fair with the men who now compose our National Guard.

In conclusion, let me say that this pending bill has nothing to do with national conscription or compulsory universal military training, as advocated in the Burke-Wadsworth bill. That is something entirely different. If this bill is amended, as I believe it will be, permitting the National Guard men to resign within a given number of days, provided they do not want to accept this year's training, then there will not be a compulsory thing about the bill. It will be entirely voluntary and, in view of the conditions that exist throughout the world today, who can object to a national defense where the personnel is composed entirely of volunteers? For my part, I shall support this legislation with the amendments which, I feel sure, will be adopted.

Mr. ARENDS. Mr. Chairman, I yield 5 minutes to the gentleman from North Dakota [Mr. BURDICK].

Mr. BURDICK. Mr. Chairman, it is not very often that I have disagreed with the President since being in Congress. Most of the time I thought he was right. I have disagreed with him on one issue, and I did it quickly. I disagree with him on this issue. As one Member of Congress, I do not believe there is any emergency existing which demands that we turn over to the President of the United States full authority over all of our troops, including the National Guard.

The principal error made when this bill was drawn was pointed out by the gentleman from Michigan. If there is an emergency existing, it is the duty of this Congress to declare it. If we are to call these men out for training, let us call them out under circumstances that are right and just. When amendments are in order to this bill I propose to offer an amendment to include on page 2, line 6, the following language:

No member of the National Guard shall be called to active military duty under this act unless he has attained the age of 18 years.

We have a lot of high-school boys in North Dakota who are 15 and 16 years old. They joined the National Guard for the purpose of military training. The Congress has no right to take those boys, the potential fighters of this country, out of school.

Mr. ANDREWS. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BURDICK. I yield to the gentleman from New York.

Mr. ANDREWS. I understand that no man under the age of 18 can legally be a member of the National Guard under any circumstances.

Mr. HINSHAW. If the gentleman will yield, I know that the members of the National Guard of the State of California are from 16 years of age up.

Mr. WOODRUM of Virginia. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BURDICK. I yield to the gentleman from Virginia.

Mr. WOODRUM of Virginia. On the question of the emergency, which has been discussed on the floor, as I understand, the law creating the National Guard provides that the National Guard may be called into the national service by the President if and when Congress declares a national emergency. If Congress had heretofore declared a national emergency to exist, this legislation would not be necessary at all. Congress not having declared a national emergency to exist, the question now before Congress is whether or not it wishes to authorize the President to call the National Guard into service. It seems to me there is not the confusion about it that has been stated.

Mr. MICHENER. The thing that led me into it was the colloquy between the two gentlemen. The gentleman from Indiana was insisting that you had no right to take a National Guard man because when he enlisted he had a written contract, and that contract was the law. That is my contention, and the gentleman will agree with it.

Mr. BURDICK. Mr. Chairman, I refuse to yield further.

I suppose there are a great many lawyers on that committee. Let me read you what they propose to do. When these boys are called into active service, if they are in the employ of anyone, you propose they shall have their jobs back when they leave the service. You know that most of these boys are now in the employ of someone. A great many of them are bank clerks, or clerks in grocery stores, and have been employed for a number of years. They go out in the evenings to receive this training. You proposed during the World War that they should get their jobs back when they returned, but only a comparatively few ever got another job when he got back. It was usually filled by somebody else, and mostly by women, and you have not been able to get them out since. [Laughter.]

This is the language of the bill:

If such position was in the employ of a private employer, such employer shall restore such person to such position or to a position of like seniority status and pay unless the employer's circumstances have so changed as to make it impossible or unreasonable to do so.

You know that is unconstitutional. You cannot make anybody in the future employ anyone.

Mr. ARENDS. Mr. Chairman, I yield 1 additional minute to the gentleman from North Dakota.

Mr. BURDICK. Then you propose that if the employer does not employ that young man again you can go before the district court and make him do so. I should like to know what constitutional basis exists for an action of that kind, "unless his condition has changed," the bill states. Of course, it has. It will be made to appear that it has changed whether it has or not. You are not using these young men fairly in calling them into the service and making them leave their employment, because you are making unemployment so much the greater.

I wish you would pay attention to the proposal I am going to make in this bill on page 2, line 6, when the bill is read for amendment, because I do not propose to have this country defended by a bunch of infants as long as we are able to walk around in this Congress. I would rather go than send my son, who might be 16 years of age, to fight the cause of this country. [Applause.]

Mr. ARENDS. Mr. Chairman, I yield 5 minutes to the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. RICH].

Mr. RICH. Mr. Chairman, in considering Senate Joint Resolution 286 we find, according to the report, that the purpose of this joint resolution is to grant the President of the United States, as Commander in Chief of the armed forces, authority to order the National Guard, Reserve, and retired personnel into the active service in peacetime.

I heard the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. MAY], the chairman of the committee, make the statement that this bill declares an emergency. What emergency? I believe the Members of Congress want to be very careful what kind of an emergency we are declaring. How many Members of Congress are well enough versed to know just what this bill is supposed to do and just how much power it will grant additionally to the President of the United States when we declare an emergency? We have granted Mr. Roosevelt too much power. I warn you now to be careful and thoughtful just what you are doing. Act slow rather than repent in haste.

Mr. ANDREWS. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. RICH. I yield to the gentleman from New York.

Mr. ANDREWS. I believe I can answer that question clearly by saying that it is going to give him the power to call out the National Guard, to order them to duty, and to train them under the Chief of Staff in the territory described.

Mr. RICH. How much more authority is it going to give him? How much authority do you want to give the President? Why let him send the boys from the United States? I do not believe in it at present. No such emergency exists today in my judgment.

Mr. ANDREWS. That is all. May I remind the gentleman, and other Members of the minority, that the original request for this legislation emanated from the Chief of Staff and not from the White House.

Mr. MAY. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. RICH. I yield to the gentleman from Kentucky.

Mr. MAY. The gentleman has evidently misunderstood my meaning, because I said—and it is all I did say—that there is an existing emergency. The fact that we have appropriated billions of dollars for national defense is evidence of an emergency. This legislation is proposed in anticipation of any emergency that may exist, because if an emergency had already been declared by the Congress this would not have been necessary. The gentleman does not deny that an emergency exists, does he?

Mr. RICH. I want to know what kind of emergency there is. We have spent billions the past 7 years; what was that great emergency?

Mr. MAY. Well, I cannot tell the gentleman if he does not already know.

Mr. RICH. I believe much of it unnecessary. I do not want it to happen again. I do not know that an emergency exists whereby we should grant the President of the United States such enormous power, not only the power that is given him in this bill, but in the legislation that has been passed in the last 6 or 7 years whereby the Congress has granted him such enormous power. It is more than a good man would want and certainly more than a bad man should have.

Mr. MAY. The gentleman knows that the National Guard trains every year for a short period.

Mr. RICH. Absolutely. And wisely so. They get much needed training in the States wherein they live.

Mr. MAY. What is there revolutionary about calling them out for a year's training if they all desire training?

Mr. RICH. I will explain what is revolutionary about that. When the National Guard was formed, it was formed for the purpose of the States having a military organization of their own that could be used in case of an emergency by each and every State of the United States. The Governor of the State had charge of the National Guard and the only power granted to the President of the United States was that in case we were at war he would have the power to take away from the State the right and the authority that the Governor possessed.

Mr. ANDREWS. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. RICH. Are you going to give me some more time? If you are, I will yield.

Mr ARENDS. I will yield the gentleman more time. How much more time does the gentleman want?

Mr. RICH. I want as much as the gentleman can give me.

Mr. ARENDS. Mr. Chairman, I yield the gentleman 5 more minutes.

Mr. ANDREWS. I want to ask the gentleman from Pennsylvania if he has read the National Defense Act?

Mr. RICH. No; I have not.

Mr. ANDREWS. I want to remind the gentleman that with the passage of the National Defense Act, as amended in 1920, the National Guard is no longer the National Guard of the State, it is the National Guard of the United States, and the oath taken by every enlisted man and every officer is today the same as the oath taken by any man in the Regular Army, and the President today has the power to call the National Guard into service, with the permission of the Governors, with no declaration of any emergency, and to send them anywhere in the United States or its Territories that he may wish.

Mr. RICH. Suppose some emergency exists in a particular State, and the need of the guard is wanted in the State, what is the Governor of that State going to have to exercise any right or meet any emergency that may exist in that State?

We should have a lot of time to discuss that and try to get something that will be for the best interests of our country. That is all I am interested in and I do not want to grant to the President of the United States such authority that he might declare a national emergency to exist and then set himself up as a dictator in this land. That is the very serious situation that we are confronted with here in this country, and so far as I am concerned, I do not propose to grant such power to anyone, regardless of whether he may be a Republican or a Democrat. I want no dictator and we are just about to get one, if I can read the sign of the times here in Washington.

Mr. HALLECK. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. RICH. I yield to the distinguished and able gentleman from Indiana.

Mr. HALLECK. The National Defense Act has again been referred to, and I would like to cite to the gentleman and to the Members of the House a part of section 58 of that act, which is the section that creates the National Guard, which reads as follows:

Provided, That the members of the National Guard of the United States shall not be in the active service of the United States except when ordered thereto in accordance with law; and, in time of peace, they shall be administered, armed, uniformed, equipped, and trained in their status as the National Guard of the several States, Territories, and the District of Columbia, as provided in this act.

Mr. RICH. If that is correct, then the statement made by the gentleman from New York is not correct.

Mr. PATRICK. Oh, no.

Mr. RICH. From the information we are getting from some of the men on the Military Affairs Committee, we ought to be sure that they understand the law. If they become confused, how can you expect us to get the true facts?

Mr. BENDER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. RICH. I yield to the gentleman from Ohio.

Mr. BENDER. One of the gentlemen suggested that this did not emanate from the President of the United States, but rather from the Chief of Staff of the Army. I want to make this observation: It appears that the Chief of Staff of the Army was asleep at the switch when we consider the manner in which money Congress appropriated was spent during the past 7 years. In checking the record we found that most equipment was "on order" and that we were not prepared, as we should have been, considering the money that was expended. I say that we need to reexamine every statement that the Chief of Staff has made or is making in connection with all these matters, so that we may know more clearly what we are doing here instead of accepting as gospel that which comes from the Chief of Staff. I believe our present Chief of Staff is an excellent officer, a fine gentleman, but I do not believe him to be infallible.

Mr. RICH. Let me call the gentleman's attention to a statement from Gen. George C. Marshall, Chief of Staff of the United States Army, with reference to this bill. You will find the statement in the report:

In the present situation we couldn't even proceed on an emergency basis because we can't presume an action of Congress.

We are very much embarrassed, as the time is passing, the fall is approaching, the Congress has before it a measure for compulsory service; the ordering of the National Guard on active duty, preliminary to the operation of a compulsory selective-service act, is an absolute necessity.

The Chief of Staff comes here and tells us that we must have a selective draft. It seems to me that the Members of Congress ought to be intelligent enough, ought to be patriotic enough, ought to be citizens of this country well enough grounded in the fundamental principles of American democracy, to determine that question in peacetime. I am informed we can get all the men to enlist we want, if we let them know it will be for 1 year and that their pay be at least equal to that of a C. C. C. boy. Certainly it is worth a trial.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Pennsylvania has expired.

Mr. ARENDS. Mr. Chairman, I yield the gentleman four and a half minutes.

Mr. RICH. Now, if the Congress is supposed to be elected by the people, they should be very careful what kind of laws they pass, and they should not permit the Chief of Staff of the Army, or the President of the United States, to say what is going to happen and they should not be as gullible as a lot of ducks and swallow anything they send here and tell us to enact into law. I do not believe in that kind of legislation. Let us get the facts and assume our responsibility.

Mr. SMITH of Ohio. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. RICH. Yes; I yield to the gentleman from Ohio.

Mr. SMITH of Ohio. If this act is a declaration of emergency, as the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. MAY] alleges, then I ask the gentleman from Kentucky, or the gentleman from Pennsylvania, to tell also why it is not a declaration of war.

Mr. RICH. I cannot answer that, but I am against any war of aggression. I say that the Members of Congress have not been informed of the great national emergency that may lead us to war. We must be careful what we do. We have not been informed by the President or by the Military Affairs Committee or by the Chief of Staff of the Army. We are asking for light. When somebody has nerve enough to get up in Congress and try to find out what the emergency is, then somebody says that he is a member of the "fifth column," as was the case with Lindbergh when he made his speech in Chicago. I am a 100-percent American, and no one can get up and tell me that I am a "fifth columnist." I would like to catch him in a back alley and then we would find out whether I will fight for America or not, or whether he was a good sound American when he would make the charge that any just criticism of this bill was un-American. I do not propose to have anybody question my 100-percent Americanism. I believe in free thought and free speech and I will fight to maintain it.

Mr. VAN ZANDT. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. RICH. Yes; I yield to the distinguished gentleman from Pennsylvania.

Mr. VAN ZANDT. The gentleman mentioned the Chief of Staff of the Army. I want to say that the Chief of Staff of the Army is one of the finest soldiers in the country, and he takes his orders as a good soldier should from the Commander in Chief of the Army.

Mr. RICH. And if he says that we are to have this bill because the Commander in Chief of the Army, who is the President of the United States, says so, I say that we should go mighty slow, and we want to know what we are doing because if we are in an emergency, we are treading on the thinnest kind of ice any Congress has ever tread on in the history of the Nation, and we might be a very sorrowful people, because we might set up a dictatorship, and you know what a dictatorship meant to the countries of Europe. The people there lost their liberty, they lost their freedom, and I never propose to stand up, clap my heels together, hold my hands up, and say, "Heil, Roosevelt"—that is what we are leading to I am afraid. I will go face the firing squad before I ever do that in free America.

Mr. MASON. If this bill is simply to provide a year's training of the National Guard, and they need it, I am for the bill, but I see no reason why, if it is just simply to provide a training for the National Guard, they include the whole Western Hemisphere, because the training can be done much better on United States soil where everything is convenient, and we should not send the boys to South America. This bill takes in the whole Western Hemisphere, and that takes in more than simply training.

Mr. RICH. If you are going to pass this bill, then you ought to limit the training to the confines of our own country and not permit the President of the United States to take these boys away from our own country.

Mr. MASON. Then I will vote for the bill, but not otherwise.

Mr. CRAWFORD. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. RICH. Yes, I yield to the distinguished gentleman from Michigan.

Mr. CRAWFORD. Just to point out this one thing. One of the outstanding committees of the House has voted out a bill to provide Latin America with a half billion dollars, in the name of national defense.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Pennsylvania has again expired.

Mr. ARENDS. I yield the gentleman 1 additional minute.

Mr. RICH. We have had a tax bill for $1,007,000,000. We are trying to cover up the squandering of the New Deal for the past 7 years and we are putting it all into national defense. They are going to bring in another tax bill now and they are going to try to fool and humbug the people into the fact that the industries of this country are not going to make a war profit. But when they bring that bill in be careful that they do not ask you to increase the national-debt limit from $49,000,000,000. You know, you raised it from forty-five to forty-nine billion when you passed this tax bill several weeks ago, and now they are going to come in and ask you for ten or fifteen billion dollars more of an increase to the national debt, and the first thing you know we are going to sink this Nation because of the fact that you will not have a sound financial policy and set-up. You will not be able to finance your Government. So the whole structure is going to collapse. It is time that Congress woke up. It is time that Congress knew what it was doing before it passes this bill today. It should be and must be properly amended before I vote for anything like it in the guise of a national emergency. [Laughter and applause.]

Mr. MAY. Mr. Chairman, I yield 10 minutes to the gentleman from Texas [Mr. THOMASON].

Mr. THOMASON. Mr. Chairman, I am sorry and surprised at the turn this debate has taken. In reply to my very warm personal friend who preceded me on the floor, the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. SHAFER], I would like to say I do not for a minute question the fact that he would have opposed this bill when it was reported out of the committee, but the fact remains that nearly all members of the committee were present and there was not a vote against it when the motion was made to report it out favorably.

I was not surprised at my friend, the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. RICH], giving this a political aspect, but that was not the viewpoint of the committee in considering this bill. You are making a mountain out of a mole hill about this emergency question which the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. MICHENER] has raised. Talk about an emergency—if you want to make this emergency legislation and give the President of the United States power and authority to exercise every bit of authority that is given under the National Defense Act, you will see plenty of action and the exercise of authority. This is a just and equitable measure to provide training for the National Guard without declaring an emergency.

One reason I am so surprised at the attitude of some of my friends on this measure is this: The hue and cry on the floor of this House for a month and in the committee of which I have the honor to be a member, and right now at the other end of the Capitol and in the newspapers of the country, is "For heaven's sake, do not pass a draft bill or a compulsory military training bill. Give us voluntary enlistment and voluntary service." Now you have the National Guard, one of the finest and most patriotic organizations that this country can boast of, with a membership of approximately 242,000, all of whom enlisted in that service voluntarily, to serve their country when the necessity arises. They did it voluntarily and patriotically.

Right today in up-State New York, down in Louisiana, out in Seattle, out in Chicago, 150,000 or 200,000 of those men are out there training because they wanted to become competent soldiers. Now we have a bill to permit the only voluntary organization of any size or consequence that we have in our Military Establishment to go into service for a year, when it is generally reported that 90 percent of them want to do their duty if a crisis is imminent; and those who do not have a way to get out honorably, because there is no man, whether he be officer or enlisted man, who cannot get out voluntarily before this act takes effect if he desires to do so and obtains the consent of his Governor. If he does not get out of the service before this act takes effect, he can still get out of service if he says that he has dependents and nothing but his salary or wages upon which they can survive. Then he is given permission to resign. Now, what is wrong about that?

Mr. MILLER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. THOMASON. I yield.

Mr. MILLER. Did I understand the gentleman to say any man could get out of the National Guard now?

Mr. THOMASON. With the approval of the Governor of his State.

Mr. MILLER. Oh, well——

Mr. THOMASON. Well, surely the Governor of the gentleman's State of Connecticut and the Governor of my own State, if the circumstances justified, would approve a man's withdrawal from the National Guard, and if his reasons were not good and sound in this day of crisis, he has got no right to get out of the service.

Mr. MILLER. I will grant that.

Mr. VAN ZANDT. And a commissioned officer in the National Guard at the present time can resign.

Mr. THOMASON. Of course he can, but he has to get the approval of his Governor. If he has a good reason, the Governor will grant it; and if he does not have a good reason, he has no business getting out. America is facing the greatest crisis in all its glorious history. This is a time when all our citizens must do their patriotic duty. Here are 242,000 patriotic National Guard men who voluntarily say, "We want to serve our country and we want to be trained to do it in the best possible way." We are not sending these men out to fight. We are not declaring war. We are only giving them training so they will be able to take care of themselves and also to properly use all the mechanized equipment common to modern war.

Some have contended we are here to create an emergency, some talk politics, and somebody back there—I believe the gentleman from Ohio—criticized the great Chief of Staff. I do not appreciate that because I do not believe it is deserved. I have seen General Marshall day in and day out testify before the House Committee on Military Affairs and let me say that in my judgment, there is no finer man, there is no more patriotic man, and there is not a man in this Nation who knows as much about our military situation today as does General George Marshall. [Applause.]

Mr. MAY. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. THOMASON. I yield.

Mr. MAY. During the hearings on this bill and likewise the National Guard bill, I have received hundreds, yes thousands, of letters. I have received hundreds of letters from National Guard men. In not one of them has there been any statement against the proposal to call them into training.

Mr. THOMASON. Why, certainly, that is true. Some of the remarks that have been made during the course of this debate have been a reflection, almost an insult upon the patriotism of the men in the National Guard. They are not drafted men, they are not men upon whom compulsion has been used to force them into the service. Many of them are men who year in and year out, from the World War to the present time, including a lot of fine young men who realize and appreciate their patriotic duty to their country, have voluntarily enlisted. There is not a word, there is not a line in this bill that is not fair.

Mr. BOLLES. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. THOMASON. I yield.

Mr. BOLLES. Is the gentleman in favor of sending the National Guard any place in the Western Hemisphere?

Mr. THOMASON. I reply to my friend from Wisconsin that I am in favor of clothing the President with authority to do so if it becomes necessary.

Mr. BOLLES. Would the gentleman be in favor of sending them to Ecuador, for instance?

Mr. THOMASON. Anywhere in the Western Hemisphere, may I say to my friend from Wisconsin, particularly in view of the recent Habana agreement. If that agreement is to be anything but a joke to our friends in Latin America we must be willing to back up our words by our acts.

Mr. BOLLES. Does the gentleman think they want our troops down there?

Mr. THOMASON. I can visualize a situation like this—I have been down to Panama twice within the last 18 months and have tried to study the situation down there, which I regard as the most dangerous spot in our national defense—suppose our men were down there, some from the Regular Army and some from the National Guard, and that a situation should arise just across the border of the western line or the eastern line of that narrow 10-mile Panama Canal Zone over which we have jurisdiction. Would the gentleman say that he would send the Regular troops across the line to meet the crisis, that he would try to separate, to differentiate, or to distinguish between the Regulars and the National Guard, and that he would leave the National Guard back in the Panama Canal Zone? That would only result in confusion.

Mr. BOLLES. I may answer the gentleman by saying I cannot picture in my imagination a crisis arising beyond the zone of our control in Panama, in view of the jungle, the snakes, and the wildlife around there.

Mr. THOMASON. But the gentleman lives in Wisconsin.

Mr. BOLLES. I may live in Wisconsin now, but I have traveled all over South and Central America.

Mr. THOMASON. Then, let us take the situation to Canada. Does the gentleman mean to tell me that if the National Guard is called out and they are in training along with Regular troops near the Canadian border, near Buffalo or up in the gentleman's country and a serious situation should arise just over the line in Canada perhaps as a result of the terrible thing that is now going on in England, and the Canadians should need our help that our Regular troops might go over the line but the National Guard might not? No. You cannot have an efficient army that way.

We must lodge authority somewhere. I feel very deeply about this matter and this is no time for politics, this is no time for partisanship. [Applause.] This is the time when every one of us should rise to the support of our democratic institutions. I do not want to put the consideration of this bill on the basis of politics or partisanship. This is no time to debate the compulsory training bill. We will cross that bridge when we get to it.

Think of the millions of men under arms in Europe today, and then think of our own little Army which I believe to be the finest in personnel and morale in the world—a Regular Army of 270,000 today and a National Guard of 242,000. This is no time for technicalities and hair-splitting. This is no time for politics or abuse of the President of the United States. It is not a question of who is the President of the United States or what his name may be, but it is a question of whether or not we are going to be able to defend our country and our free institutions. [Applause.]

Mr. MAY. Mr. Chairman, I yield 5 additional minutes to the gentleman from Texas.

Mr. HALLECK. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. THOMASON. I yield to the gentleman from Indiana.

Mr. HALLECK. In view of the confidence of the gentleman from Texas that a large percentage of the members of the National Guard are very anxious to get into this service for a year, would he have any serious objection to striking out of the bill that part contained in line 9, reading "with or without their consent"?

Mr. THOMASON. No. I do not think you can get an army on that kind of basis. I do not think you can leave it to the wishes of every man in the service. You cannot have an efficient army that way. When a man joins the National Guard he takes an oath and says he will defend this country under any and all circumstances if it becomes necessary. He then becomes a member of the National Army of the United States. Now, then, to leave it to his whim and fancy whether he will or will not serve would result in a worse situation than poor old France suffered.

Mr. MASSINGALE. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. THOMASON. I yield to the gentleman from Oklahoma.

Mr. MASSINGALE. I appreciate very much the sincerity of the gentleman's statement, and I applaud him for it, but it is a thing that seems to me to be most serious in the bill. There is a statement here that all members or units of the National Guard are going to be taken into the Regular Army service. What is the sentiment of the gentleman from Texas, and the people of the United States, in regard to those boys, and they number thousands in the gentleman's district and probably in his home town as in mine, who are in the National Guard and are under the age of 18 years?

Mr. THOMASON. Boys under 18 cannot legally join the National Guard. Of course, that is an immature age to be sending boys to war; but may I say to the gentleman from Oklahoma it has been in the National Defense Act ever since it was passed in 1916 that when a man voluntarily enlists in the National Guard and he later is called into the Federal service, he becomes a part of the Army of the United States.

Mr. MASSINGALE. That is true; but the gentleman knows that under high-pressure methods which are resorted to, many boys are taken into the National Guard.

Mr. THOMASON. That is the very thing this bill seeks to avoid. This is not a high-pressure method. This is doing it voluntarily; and if these men join, they ought and will do their duty.

Mr. MASSINGALE. The gentleman does not get my question. Where they have high pressured young boys 16 and 17 years old to join the National Guard, does it not require the exercise of good conscience and common sense on the part of the Congress of the United States to wipe out any kind of service on the part of those children?

Mr. THOMASON. I may say if the gentleman has children down there in western Oklahoma——

Mr. MASSINGALE. I have not any. Mine are all too old.

Mr. THOMASON. Assuming the gentleman has some children who have been high pressured into the National Guard and they are only 16 or 17 years old, I have enough faith in your Governor, Mr. Phillips, that if the boy wants out of the service, all he has to do is to request it and the Governor will let him out. This is a voluntary service.

Mr. MASSINGALE. I am not talking about Governor Phillips.

Mr. THOMASON. Well, let us talk about Governor O'Daniel, of my State.

Mr. MASSINGALE. I am not interested in Governor O'Daniel, of Texas, either. I am interested in the Congress of the United States. I asked the gentleman a plain question, if he did not think it would be proper and right for the Congress of the United States to exempt and exclude from those called anyone under the age of 18 years?

Mr. THOMASON. I believe he ought to be out and I believe the Governor would approve it. I repeat that any man in the National Guard can get out if he wants to before this bill passes, and the Governor will approve it if he has good reason. He can do that. A man can also get out if he has dependents. But other than that, a man ought to be made to do his duty under those circumstances.

Mr. MASSINGALE. I agree with the gentleman on that.

Mr. McLAUGHLIN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. THOMASON. I yield to the gentleman from Nebraska.

Mr. McLAUGHLIN. I should like to propound an inquiry of the gentleman. One of the uses to which the National Guard is normally put in peacetime is the policing of local situations in case of national catastrophes, riots, and that sort of thing. I wonder if the committee gave any consideration to the question as to what provision will be made for that sort of policing, in the event the National Guard units are called away from the respective States in which they serve?

Mr. MAY. Mr. Chairman, I yield the gentleman 5 additional minutes.

Mr. SMITH of Connecticut. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. THOMASON. I yield to the gentleman from Connecticut.

Mr. SMITH of Connecticut. I may say, answering the question of the gentleman from Nebraska the committee now has under consideration legislation which would allow the States to form military forces outside the National Guard. That would be then a State militia. It also has under consideration provision for the Federal Government to furnish equipment to such State forces, the plan being, and it has been started in some States, to form a State guard or State militia to take the place of guard units which are outside the State.

Mr. THOMASON. In addition to what the gentleman from Connecticut says, I have always felt that the home people are going to take care of that sort of situation. I am one of those who happens to believe that the National Guard was never created or organized or should function to stop strikes, riots, and things like that unless under a great and terrible emergency. I think it was meant for military use and defense.

Mr. DONDERO. It seems to me that those who are against conscription in peacetime might well feel that the adoption of this measure would make that unnecessary.

Mr. THOMASON. You have the finest alibi in the world if you are against conscription, because you have a great and patriotic organization that wants to get out and get proper training.

Mr. DONDERO. It would make conscription unnecessary.

Mr. THOMASON. I am trying to think of this as something other than a local matter. It is the headlines appearing in the paper today and the testimony of Secretary of the Navy Knox today before the House Committee on Military Affairs, when he testified from an absolutely nonpolitical standpoint and from a highly patriotic viewpoint, that alarms me. I believe it is time for all of us to get away from petty feelings about smaller matters and think in terms of the bigger question of saving America, and preserving our institutions. To do this you must provide some form of training. If you cannot do it, as the gentleman from Michigan suggests, by the voluntary method of training the National Guard when they want to go, you may just as well expect conscription, because it has to come, if you can trust the judgment and advice of our military authorities.

Mr. VAN ZANDT. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. THOMASON. I yield to the gentleman from Pennsylvania.

Mr. VAN ZANDT. The real intent of this bill is to modernize the National Guard by mechanizing it and then training the men to use the mechanisms. That would take 12 months.

Mr. THOMASON. I read a very interesting speech by Colonel "Wild Bill" Donovan made in New York, in which he told about what a mechanized age this is, and said that these young boys of 18 and 20 cannot understand and appreciate the delicate operation of highly mechanized trucks, armored cars, and airplanes. If we are going to have an efficient Army, if we are going to have an Army that can compete with that of the madman who is now running loose and wild in Europe, you have to give these men some training. That is all in the world this bill does. I say in all candor, this bill ought to have the unanimous support of the House.

Mrs. ROGERS of Massachusetts. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. THOMASON. I yield to the gentlewoman from Massachusetts.

Mrs. ROGERS of Massachusetts. The gentleman has partially answered the question I was going to ask. My understanding is that one reason this bill was brought up for consideration was that the National Guard may be properly trained. I understand that modern warfare and modern defense is so difficult, so highly technical, that it is necessary to give the National Guard much more complete training. The training they now receive is very meager. They may have reason later to blame us if we do not vote for this bill. We are going to expect these men to defend us later, if necessary, and they must be trained, in my opinion, for their own protection as well as ours.

Mr. LUTHER A. JOHNSON. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. THOMASON. I yield to the gentleman from Texas.

Mr. LUTHER A. JOHNSON. May I ask my friend, whose judgment on military affairs I regard very highly, if he does not believe that defeat of this bill would be one of the greatest encouragements that could come to Mr. Hitler and other dictators, and further, if it would not be a discouragement to the South American countries whose cooperation we seek in defense of the Monroe Doctrine?

Mr. THOMASON. The South American republics would have just cause to believe we were just doing a lot of talking and not going to back it up. I believe, too, that Mr. Hitler would be encouraged. There is one thing about which I am very certain, and that is that if this Congress will not permit the only great military organization we have that was organized upon a voluntary basis to go out and learn something about modern warfare when they want to go, then you may just as well expect the draft, because if you can believe our military authorities you have to have some trained men if you expect to defend this country. [Applause.]

Mr. ARENDS. Mr. Chairman, I yield 10 minutes to the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. MARTIN].

Mr. MARTIN of Iowa. Mr. Chairman, the Committee on Military Affairs has given a lot of time, hard work, and attention to this particular bill. They have tried to work out as good a bill as could be worked out. The committee has worked out a bill calculated to strengthen the national defense.

There has been a lot of discussion in committee and a lot of disagreement over individual and specific provisions of the bill, but the overwhelming weight of opinion in the committee was and is now that we need to build up our defenses by calling the National Guard to active duty, or better, to training. You will notice the bill states "duty." There has been a lot of discussion about whether "duty" is what most of them want, or whether it is training.

We are all interested in building up the national defense to a point that is adequate. The Regular Army officials have told us a lot about the need for calling out the guard. They are sincere in their desire to call it out, and I believe they are sincere in building up our defenses through adequate training. I am giving them the benefit of the doubt as to their motive, at least to that extent.

After listening to and reading a considerable portion of the Senate and House debate on the National Guard bill and the compulsory military training bill, I have been impressed with the wide divergence of views with reference to the powers of the President as Commander in Chief of the armed forces of the United States in peacetime, and that is the background for some difference of opinion as to specific portions of this bill.

It is extremely important at this time that we examine as carefully and thoroughly as possible the extent of these powers in order to make sure that whatever powers Congress desires to exercise may be included in the legislation with the greatest possible understanding of the situation. At the outset of my search for information, I was very much impressed when I found in reading the book the Making of the Constitution, page 530, by Charles Warren, the following statement:

> On August 27, 1787, another power suggested by the committee was granted to the President, without debate (so far as appears from Madison's notes) that of "Commander in Chief of the Army and Navy of the United States and of the militia of the several States when called into the actual service of the United States." Such a power had been vested in the State Governors in practically all the State constitutions; and in some the Governor had few powers or functions other than military.

That is why they did not debate the matter very thoroughly in the Constitutional Convention. So going back to the Constitutional Convention you cannot find any very great light on the division of power between the President and the Congress in the matter of national defense. The wording of the Constitution, of course, is quite general.

I was very much impressed in reading the annotations of the Constitution of the United States to find so few references therein to discussions of the peacetime power by our Supreme Court. In some of these cases, the statement is made that Congress has the power not only to raise and support and govern armies but to declare war and that it has therefore the power to provide by law for carrying on war. The Court in these cases states further that the command of forces and the conduct of campaigns are powers derived from the Constitution, but inasmuch as neither is defined by that instrument, their extent must be determined by their nature and by the principles of our institutions. The Court states also that the power to make the necessary laws is in Congress and the power to execute is in the President, and each includes all authority essential to its due exercise "but neither can the President, in war more than in peace, intrude upon the proper authority of Congress, nor Congress upon the proper authority of the President" (Ex parte Milligan, 4 Wall. 2, 139 (1866); Swaim v. United States, 28 C. Cls. 173, 221 (1893), affirmed 165 U. S. 553 (1897)).

I have made a very brief search for authoritative statements with particular reference to the powers of the President as Commander in Chief of the armed forces of the United States in time of peace, and I will ask unanimous consent at the proper time to have them inserted in the RECORD immediately following these remarks. Insofar as my time permits, I will read portions of these quotations and I will be very glad indeed if any Member sees fit to supplement these statements with additional statements, either amplifying or opposing the views herein set out. My purpose in making this small contribution to the discussion at this time is to impress upon the House the importance of the full exercise at this time of such powers as the House may wish to exercise in restricting the power of the President with special reference to the sending of the Reserve components of our armed forces into foreign countries after they have been ordered to active duty as part of the Army of the United States.

Prof. Edward S. Corwin, on The President's Control of Foreign Relations, states:

> I conclude that the Presidential power under survey (the right to perform acts of war without congressional authorization where the question is as to his right to take measures which are technically acts of war in protection of American rights abroad) is somewhat analogous to the so-called right of self-preservation at international law. Theoretically the power is a defensive power and reserved for grave and sudden emergencies. Practically, the limit to it is to be found in the powers of Congress and public opinion.

Elihu Root, in a famous debate in the Senate in 1912, had the following statement to make:

> In my judgment, there is no law which forbids the President to send troops of the United States out of this country into any country where he considers it to be his duty as Commander in Chief of the Army to send them, unless it be for the purpose of making war, which, of course, he cannot do.
> Doubtless, Congress could by law forbid the troops being sent out of the country; doubtless Congress has not done it; and I apprehend that any Congress which undertook to do it would find a general protest from the people of the United States against depriving the Commander in Chief of the Army of the power to protect our citizens under those circumstances which exist widely throughout the world, in countries whose governments have not the power to maintain order within their jurisdiction. From time immemorial it has been the practice of civilized nations to send troops into those countries whose governments were too feeble or too ill-organized, too deficient in power to enforce their laws and protect foreigners.

This has primarily to do, of course, with protecting our own citizens abroad.

Prof. Clarence A. Berdahl, in his book, War Powers of the Executive in the United States, has the following to say:

> An eminent authority (Elihu Root) thinks that Congress could probably by law forbid the troops being sent out of the jurisdiction of the United States in time of peace; but in time of war the authority of the President is recognized as being absolute as to where the war is to be conducted, whether to await the onslaughts of the enemy and wage a purely defensive war within the boundaries of the United States, or to send the armed forces of the United States out of the country to carry on an offensive war in the enemy territory, in the territory of an ally, or perhaps even in the territory of a neutral.

William Howard Taft, in one of his lectures on Our Chief Magistrate and His Powers, had the following to say:

> The President is the Commander in Chief of the Army and Navy, and the militia when called into the service of the United States. Under this he can order the Army and Navy anywhere he will, if the appropriations furnish the means of transportation. Of course, the instrumentality which this power furnishes, gives the President an opportunity to do things which involve consequences that it would be quite beyond his power under the Constitution directly to effect. Under the Constitution, only Congress has the power to declare war, but with the Army and the Navy, the President can take action such as to involve the country in war and to leave Congress no option but to declare it or to recognize its existence. This was the charge made against President Polk in beginning the Mexican War. War as a legal fact, it was decided by the Supreme Court in prize cases, can exist by invasion of this country by a foreign enemy or by such an insurrection as occurred during the Civil War, without any declaration of war by Congress at all, and it is only in the case of a war of our aggression against a foreign country that the power of Congress must be affirmatively asserted to establish its legal existence.
> What constitutes an act of war by the land or naval forces of the United States is sometimes a nice question of law and fact. It really seems to differ with the character of the nation whose relations with the United States are affected. The unstable condition as to law and order of some of the Central American republics seems to create different rules of international law from those that obtain in governments that can be depended upon to maintain their own peace and order. It has been frequently necessary for the President to direct the landing of naval marines from United States vessels in Central America to protect the American consulate and American citizens and their property. He has done this under his general power as Commander in Chief. It grows not out of any specific act of Congress but out of that obligation, inferable from the Constitution, of the Government to protect the rights of an American citizen against foreign aggression, as in the Kotza incident, cited by Mr. Justice Miller in the Neagle case. In practice the use of the naval marines for such a purpose has become so common that their landing is treated as a mere local police measure, whereas if troops of the Regular Army are used for such a purpose, it seems to take on the color of an act of war.

Thus it would be difficult to explain the landing of our Army in Vera Cruz by force as anything but an act of war to punish the government of Huerta in Mexico for its refusal to render what was deemed by President Wilson as a proper apology for a violation of our international rights in the arrest of some of our sailors. This act was committed before authority was given by Congress, but the necessary authority for it had passed one House and was passing another at the time, and the question as to the right of the Executive to take the action without congressional authority was avoided by full and immediate ratification.

In Nicaragua in my administration an insurrection had led to the immurement of American citizens by insurrectos and the threatened destruction of American property. The President of Nicaragua, whom we had recognized and whose minister we had received, called upon us to protect our own citizens and their property because he was unable to render them the protection which their treaty rights gave them. This led to the landing of marines, and quite a campaign, which resulted in the maintenance of law and order and the elimination of the insurrectos. This was not an act of war because it was done at the request and with the consent of the lawful authorities of the territory where it took place.

I think it is important for us to bear in mind the broad expanse of the powers of the President, but to distinguish clearly between his powers in peacetime as contrasted with his powers in wartime.

Mr. HARNESS. Mr. Chairman, I yield the gentleman from Iowa 1 additional minute.

Mr. MARTIN of Iowa. Mr. Chairman, I intend to either offer or support an amendment calculated to restrict the President as to the places to which he can send these troops in case they are ordered out to duty under the provisions of this bill. I would like myself to see the program restricted primarily to a training program. That is what I have in mind and most desire at the present time, and I think we need such a program. If any further emergency comes up and these boys are in training, I think we can take care of the emergencies as they arise, but let us get our training program started now and look after these other emergencies later on. I think that whatever emergency exists today is one calling for training and not an emergency requiring the giving authority to the President to send them abroad without further consultation with the Congress. [Applause.]

Mr. MAY. Mr. Chairman, I yield 1 minute to the gentleman from Connecticut [Mr. SHANLEY].

Mr. SHANLEY. Mr. Chairman and members of the Committee, may I ask a question of the chairman of the committee and also the ranking member of the committee on the minority side? The thought has come to me in reading this bill that there is no provision for pay increases to compensate the National Guard men on maneuvers, who I understand are now receiving $30 on a month's pay scale, while their entry into the active military service of the United States would restore them to the $21-a-month scale of the Regular Army.

It seems to me that such a drop would have a most discouraging and dampening effect on those boys who are called upon to make one of the greatest sacrifices of our peacetime existence; I might even venture the opinion that few members of the National Guard who are expecting to be called into active military service realize that such a drop in pay is possible. I am sure that this great and hard-working committee upon whose shoulders has been placed this tremendous and awe-inspiring duty would not wish to allow such a drop. For these reasons I am anxious to bring the entire matter before the committee.

Mr. FADDIS. The base pay of the Regular Army at this time is $21 a month, and if any unit in the National Guard is drawing more than $21 a month, in my opinion the State would have to make it up, because the Army cannot pay in excess of what a like grade in the Regular Army would draw.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Connecticut has expired.

Mr. MAY. Mr. Chairman, I yield the gentleman 1 minute more.

Mr. SHANLEY. May I answer my friend from Pennsylvania whose judgment in military affairs and whose service in war are extraordinary that the National Guard Bureau has so informed me that this increase is by special act while in training.

It is impossible to put an amendment here which would bring the pay of the National Guard up to $30 a month, practically speaking, in this bill.

Mr. HARNESS. The gentleman understands that a good many enlisted men in the Army get more than $21 a month. That is the minimum pay. After a few months, or a year's service, they are usually promoted to a higher grade, and they are paid more than $21 a month.

Mr. SHANLEY. On the contrary in a practical sense they do not get it. The testimony of the Army shows conclusively that there is a log jam in apportioning out increases to the land forces which places them in a very disproportionate relation to the Navy. Theoretically the gentleman is right but in the working out of Army promotions the ideal is not reached that we all would like to see.

Let me quote high authorities with chapter and verse—the testimony of that great Chief of Staff, Gen. George C. Marshall, whom I personally think is a man of military destiny—speaking in the Senate Military Affairs Committee hearings on S. 4164, shows this:

Senator REYNOLDS. A few moments ago in reference to pay, you said that you thought that the pay of the enlisted men of the Army and the officers should be increased.

General MARSHALL. I was talking specifically about the enlisted men—the privates. We have two classes.

Senator REYNOLDS. I mean the privates. Now, what is the lowest pay of any private?

General MARSHALL. $21.

Senator REYNOLDS. What is the highest pay of any private?

General MARSHALL. The base pay, I think, is $30. And that increases as a result of length of service.

General SHEDD. It increases with every enlistment.

General MARSHALL. What is the total he would get if he remained as a private, first class, for 30 years; what would his pay be?

General SHEDD. $37.50.

General MARSHALL. But as a rule, we would not want a man as a private, first class, at that age.

Senator REYNOLDS. The distinction between the pay of $21 and $30—is that automatic, based upon the number of years of service or ability?

General MARSHALL. The advance from $21 to $30 a month is carried by the promotion from private, to private first class. The promotion depends upon the vacancies; and the number of positions of private, first class, depends upon the annual appropriations. Each year we have endeavored to have them give us more funds for privates first class and certain other ratings, and we have been unsuccessful. So, as I say, we have men who serve an entire enlistment as a private on the basis of $21, because there was no vacancy for them, regardless of how good they might be, in the rating of private first class.

I believe in other services, after 4 months, they automatically pass to the first-class rating. With us we must have the vacancy to permit the advancement.

Senator REYNOLDS. You say that after 4 months it is automatic?

General MARSHALL. After 4 months' service they go to the higher rating in other services.

Senator REYNOLDS. They go in 4 months from $21 to $30?

General MARSHALL. Yes, sir. I believe that they do that. I think that that is the Navy pay system at present.

Senator REYNOLDS. I wanted to understand you correctly. Did you say that if a man goes into the Army today, after he has served as a private for 4 months, he immediately has his pay increased?

General MARSHALL. Not in the Army.

Senator REYNOLDS. Not in the Army?

General MARSHALL. I believe that is the case in the Navy.

Senator REYNOLDS. That is true in the Navy?

General MARSHALL. In the Army his advancement depends primarily on the number of vacancies, private, first class, and there are very few, and those depend upon the current appropriation. So, every year we have to change the number of privates, first class, in the organizations according to how much money the Budget and the Congress give us, and each year for a long series of years we have presented to the Budget, and otherwise strongly recommended, that we should be given this increase in ratings, because it does not seem fair to us that our men should be kept for a whole enlistment or more, on the basic pay rate of a private at $21 a month, while in the other services at the end of 4 months they automatically receive a material increase in pay. That affects recruiting and affects morale.

Senator REYNOLDS. Certainly.

General MARSHALL. And the man himself has his own opinion as to the merits of the case.

Senator REYNOLDS. It does not seem quite right.

General MARSHALL. It puts the War Department in an embarrassing position in that it seems not to recognize what is really an injustice to the enlisted personnel in the Army.

Senator REYNOLDS. Now, does the advance from $21 to $30 depend upon his mentality and ability, military ability?

General MARSHALL. It does depend very much upon his mentality, and his ability; his military ability and his mentality, both, if there is a difference there, because there are so few vacancies that it is highly competitive to get them.

Senator REYNOLDS. I see then how it is.

General MARSHALL. They compete for private, first class, as hard in the Army as they do to be a corporal.

Senator REYNOLDS. And so as a matter of fact that is limited to what percentage; about 10 percent?

General SHEDD. One private, first class, to two privates.

General MARSHALL. One to two.

Senator REYNOLDS. One private, first class, to two privates?

General MARSHALL. Yes, sir.

Senator REYNOLDS. As a matter of fact, under your recommendation for 4 months' service, that number would depend upon the appropriations made by the Congress of the United States?

For comparative purposes, the testimony of Rear Admiral Chester W. Nimitz, Chief, Bureau of Navigation, Navy Department, in the same hearings, presents the Navy picture for us. I add also the comment of this high representative of the Navy as to what helps enlistments in the sea command:

Senator REYNOLDS. Admiral, may I ask you what is the lowest pay of any enlisted man in the Navy?

Admiral NIMITZ. Twenty-one dollars a month.

Senator REYNOLDS. The same as the Army?

Admiral NIMITZ. That is an apprentice seaman; an apprentice seaman, who, when he is first enlisted, goes to the training station. His pay is $21 a month.

Senator REYNOLDS. For what period of time?

Admiral NIMITZ. Approximately 4 months.

Senator REYNOLDS. And after that?

Admiral NIMITZ. He is promoted to seaman second class, and that pay is $36 a month.

Senator REYNOLDS. Thirty-six dollars for an enlisted man in the Navy, private; that is, an ordinary seaman. They draw more pay than they do as an ordinary private in the Army, do they not?

Admiral NIMITZ. A seaman second class draws $36 a month.

Usually, because of the great expansion that has taken place, usually he would not have to wait more than a year before he would be promoted to seaman, for which he is paid $54 per month. Seaman first class and promotion in the Navy has been, for enlisted men, very good, and it is due largely to the fact that we are expanding rapidly.

Senator REYNOLDS. The Navy is in a different position, so far as volunteer enlistments are concerned, than the Army, is it not?

Admiral NIMITZ. Well, I am not familiar with the Army's experience in that respect. I just heard General Marshall's statement this morning.

Senator REYNOLDS. I am predicating my question on his statement.

Admiral NIMITZ. I heard his statement that they had no difficulty in getting the quota assigned them.

Senator REYNOLDS. You enlist them for 6 years?

Admiral NIMITZ. Yes, sir.

Senator REYNOLDS. Do you think that the extended enlistment is an inducement?

Admiral NIMITZ. I do not. It is a decidedly distinct advantage to the Navy to have a 6-year enlistment, because it reduces the turnover, the annual turn-over, to one-sixth, rather than one-fourth, of the personnel; and once we get them trained aboard ship and in key positions—and there are very few positions aboard ship which are not key positions nowadays—it is very disturbing to the organization to have one of its cogs taken out and fit a new one in.

Senator REYNOLDS. Yes. I would readily assume from hearing testimony produced before this committee that people more readily volunteer for the Navy than the Army, and I was wondering why that was. Is it due to the fact that the Navy provides opportunity to travel, see the world; increased pay; or extended enlistment? What, in your opinion, induces more men for voluntary service in the Navy than in the Army?

Admiral NIMITZ. I think the pay has something to do with it, and I think the prospect of getting about the world a little bit is an added incentive. I would not believe that the extended period of enlistment is an incentive, because I think that would operate just the other way.

Mr. VAN ZANDT. Did not the Senate agree to an amendment to the Burke-Wadsworth bill that would increase the pay of the Army to $30 a month?

Mr. SHANLEY. Yes.

Mr. VAN ZANDT. Surely this Congress would not permit a conscript to receive $30 a month alongside a Regular soldier who is receiving $21 a month.

Mr. SHANLEY. No. I reiterate that I do not think so, but it seems to me that we cannot await events. We ought to anticipate them by getting this subject before the House. I might say that leading members of the committee now indicate that this subject will be taken care of in a special bill to follow. Obviously we cannot place too much faith on the presence of the cure in the conscription bill. It may be weeks before that gets to us and to the President.

I shall ask permission when we get back into the House to include the tenor of the Lee amendment in the other body, as expressive of what we might do in this respect.

Finally, gentlemen, I know that you realize that these young men who are to be the backbone of our new Army are making great personal sacrifices. They went into the National Guard for patriotic reasons, but you and I are not going to make that patriotism cause them severe economic set-backs if we can help it. They are worth $30 a month and more, for they are for the most part bound to find it necessary to readjust their budgets and attempt to live on a smaller schedule with their families—those who will not ask for exemption.

The Lee amendment follows:

SEC. 2. (a) The monthly base pay of enlisted men of the Army shall be as follows: Enlisted men of the first grade, $126; enlisted men of the second grade, $84; enlisted men of the third grade, $72; enlisted men of the fourth grade, $60; enlisted men of the fifth grade, $54; enlisted men of the sixth grade, $36; enlisted men of the seventh grade, $30; except that the monthly base pay of enlisted men with less than 4 months' service during their first enlistment period and of enlisted men of the seventh grade whose inefficiency or other unfitness has been determined under regulations prescribed by the Secretary of War, shall be $21. The pay for specialists' ratings, which shall be in addition to monthly base pay, shall be as follows: First class, $30; second class, $25; third class, $20; fourth class, $15; fifth class, $6; sixth class, $3. Enlisted men of the Army shall receive, as a permanent addition to their pay, an increase of 10 percent of their base pay and pay for specialists' ratings upon completion of the first 4 years of service, and an additional increase of 5 percent of such base pay and pay for specialists' ratings for each 4 years of service thereafter, but the total of such increases shall not exceed 25 percent.

(b) The pay for specialists' rating received by an enlisted man of the Army at the time of his retirement shall be included in the computation of his retired pay.

(c) The pay of enlisted men of the sixth grade of the National Guard for each armory drill period, and for each day of participation in exercises under sections 94, 97, and 99 of the National Defense Act, shall be $1.20.

(d) No back pay or allowances shall accrue by reason of this act for any period prior to the date of its enactment.

(e) Nothing in this act shall operate to reduce the pay now being received by any retired enlisted man.

(f) The provisions of this section shall be effective during the period September 1, 1940, to May 15, 1945. During such period all laws and parts of laws insofar as the same are inconsistent herewith or in conflict with the provisions hereof are hereby suspended.

Mr. ARENDS. Mr. Chairman, I yield 5 minutes to the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. HOFFMAN].

THE BILL TO CALL OUT THE NATIONAL GUARD

Mr. HOFFMAN. Mr. Chairman, our people today are just as willing to make every necessary sacrifice to preserve the liberty which our forefathers won by 8 long years of bloody strife as were they.

Our people are no more ready to welcome the tyranny of a Roosevelt, his dictatorial exercises of power, than they were to submit to the tyrannical demands of King George III.

It is foolish to send aid to those who we say are fighting to preserve democracy in the Old World and then tamely submit to and grant dictatorial power to a President who, by his every utterance and act, proclaims that he is the only man in these United States who can preserve our liberty; that he must be elected to a third term and so become a dictator.

It will matter little to our children whether their heritage of material prosperity, of civil and religious liberty, of a free government is taken from them by armed forces from abroad or stolen from them by subtle grants of power given by a complaisant Congress to one who now considers, and who always will consider, himself the indispensable man—a term which is just another name for a dictator.

ESSENTIALS OF NATIONAL DEFENSE

A sound financial structure, a happy and contented people, national unity, are all essentials for a successful national defense.

Before he was intoxicated by his greed for power, Franklin Roosevelt truthfully said that many a nation had been wrecked on the rocks of a loose fiscal policy. Equally true was his statement to the effect that this Nation could not continue to borrow and survive.

Nevertheless, knowing that he would wreck our Nation financially, he deliberately, by the expenditure of vast sums, to purchase the good will and the suffrage of various groups, led this Nation into national bankruptcy.

Knowing as he did that a happy, contented people listen not to those who seek to create envy and discontent, he has done his best to destroy contentment and happiness by creating dissatisfaction, inspiring jealousy and hatred in the minds of some against their neighbors and associates.

Assuming the mask of a great humanitarian, he told our people that the vast majority was being exploited by the privileged few. During the same period, he and members of his family were profiting to the extent of millions of dollars by virtue of the exalted position which he held.

He and his, over whom he had control, like the money changers of old in the temple, deliberately sold, and profited by the sale of, the dignity of the White House, the respect and veneration in which it was held by our people.

He sought to, and to a large extent was successful in convincing a vast number of our people that they had been unjustly treated by their neighbors and that, as a matter of right, each man who had more than another should be compelled to give part of what he had to him who had less.

NATIONAL UNITY

Knowing the soundness of the statement, "United we stand; divided we fall," Franklin Roosevelt deliberately and wickedly, with the aid of Communists, preaching their antireligious doctrine, the destruction of this Government by force, alined hundreds of thousands of workers against their employers.

Through his efforts, there has been established in this Nation the condition where no man, whether he be working for a livelihood for himself and family or whether he be working to aid this Government in its effort to prepare to meet invasion from a foreign foe, can all too often no longer obtain a job until he has obtained the consent, not of a Government agency, but of a private organization; an organization whose policies are controlled by those who are enemies of our form of government.

A MALIGNANT DISEASE

The greed for power, when once it fastens upon one who has succeeded to an extraordinary degree in grasping it, is a malignant disease. It creates a sense of infallibility, of exalted egotism. Among its symptoms are delusions of grandeur; the belief that its possessor can do no wrong; that his existence is indispensable.

So completely have these delusions taken possession of our President that he now assumes that he is the only man in a nation of more than 140,000,000 people who can be trusted to safely guide the destinies of this Nation.

So obsessed has he become with this idea that he assumes that, through a dominated judiciary, puppet judges, a coattail-riding Congress, he can accomplish through a peaceful revolution what Mussolini, Stalin, and Hitler have, by strife and bloodshed, brought about in foreign lands.

HYPOCRISY

Under present world conditions, practically all concede the necessity of military training and very few, if any, are unwilling to call out the National Guard and to take all other steps as may be necessary to adequately prepare this Nation to meet any and all foes.

Under the guise of giving military training, the President asks for authority to call out the National Guard for training purposes. That is a legitimate demand, but, as so often, coupled with it is a grant of dictatorial power.

Military training, which is the announced purpose of the bill, could best be brought about within the limits of the continental United States. Under the guise of a demand that we should have military training given to members of the National Guard; hiding behind that false front, the President and his supporters insert in that bill the power to send our National Guard anywhere in the Western Hemisphere, which means to the southernmost limits of South America.

Do you for one moment believe that, in order to train the National Guard, they should be sent to South America?

For months, the President has been carrying on a drive to involve us in the European war. Not only by his provocative utterances but by his acts has he sought to accomplish that purpose.

He even went so far, when he advocated the sending of vessels of war to Great Britain, as to propose the violation of a criminal statute—a law which he had taken a solemn oath to uphold.

No; this move of his to call out the National Guard is not solely for the purpose of giving that organization military training. Behind it and within it, not even successfully disguised, is the authority to send the National Guard into South America, into territory where Germans have a sphere of influence; where the guard can, and in all probability will, become involved in the local warfare which is certain to follow.

Then, the guard once involved, what will be the demand? It will be that our National Guard, in trouble and perhaps in danger in South America, be reinforced by the Regular Army.

Then will come the statement that the Regular Army is not adequate for that purpose and conscription must follow. So, then the President will have accomplished his ultimate purpose, which, judged by all his utterances and acts, is to involve this Nation in the World War.

True, the President said that there was not one chance in a hundred that the guard, if called, would be sent beyond the limits of the continental United States. Unfortunately, as we have learned to our sorrow, the President's word is worthless. He cannot be trusted to carry out his promises.

To support the charge that he is untruthful, we need but recall the statement of the President given to the American people through Senator BARKLEY at the Chicago Convention that he "has never had, and has not today, any desire or purpose to continue in the office of President, to be a candidate for that office, or to be nominated by the convention for that office."

The American people do not believe that statement.

Of it Raymond Clapper, voted one of the fairest and most accurate of American newspaper columnists, said: "I simply do not believe that," and characterized it as a "monumental and historic deception."

I, for one, so long as I remain in Congress, will cast my vote for national preparedness; for the appropriation of all sums which by any stretch of the imagination can be deemed necessary to procure the things which we need for national defense.

More than once have I proposed that Congress, if war comes to this country, conscript not only man power for the Army and Navy, capital and industry, but that we all go in on an equal, common basis, each and every one, man or woman, being required to make the necessary sacrifice, to contribute to his utmost.

Believing in the Government of my forefathers, firmly convinced that under it our people can enjoy a greater degree of prosperity, of intellectual achievement, of civil and religious freedom, than under any other form of government, I will not, so long as I am in Congress, vote to give to any man, under the guise of a preparedness program which, as a matter of fact, is known to be a scheme which will destroy all that I hold dear, the powers of a dictator.

Yes, call out the National Guard and all others whom it may be necessary to call to defend our Nation, but do not give to the President the power to involve us in war by sending our soldiers to foreign lands.

I doubt if there is a Congressman or a Senator now in office who has not either in private conversation, by letter, by press release, or public address announced to the Nation at large that he would not vote to again send our soldiers across the sea to fight in another World War.

Yet, by the passage of this very bill authorizing the calling out of the National Guard and giving the President authority to send them anywhere in the Western Hemisphere, we will make it possible for him to engage in war although Congress has not declared war.

We will by indirection do the thing which we know the people of these United States have overwhelmingly decided they are against, that is, becoming involved in the present World War.

Mussolini proclaims that Italy can exist nationally only by retaining him as dictator. Stalin contends that only because of his ability as its ruler can Soviet Russia continue as a world power. Hitler believes that without him as absolute ruler Germany as a nation would go out of existence.

Roosevelt has told us that only in time of great and extraordinary danger to our Government should any man seek a third term. Therefore, although no nation has either attacked or threatened to attack us; although we can and should adequately prepare for national defense, the President has been and is deliberately following a course which will involve us in the World War. He is seeking to create the situation which he said would justify him in becoming a candidate for a third term.

He now by his words and his acts proclaims himself as the one indispensable man in America. He, like Mussolini, Stalin, and Hitler, would like to have the American people believe that there is in each country but a single individual capable of guiding its destiny. Roosevelt already sees himself as the dictator of the Western Hemisphere.

If we would preserve our Nation, Congress should cease to grant Roosevelt dictatorial powers; should turn its attention to national defense, to a solution of our domestic problems, and the people should overwhelmingly repudiate the would-be dictator at the polls in November. [Applause.]

Mr. MAY. Mr. Chairman, I yield 5 minutes to the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. SWEENEY].

Mr. SWEENEY. Mr. Chairman, I am not so much opposed to this measure as I am to the measure now under debate in the other body—the measure providing for the conscription of flesh and blood; peacetime conscription in a democracy.

I give to every Member of this House his honest conviction as being patriotic. Though we may differ on some issues, I think we are all good Americans.

Much talk comes today about this so-called emergency. Everybody says, "Why, you know what it is. I do not have to tell you." But the Congress lacks the intestinal fortitude to write it into this bill and the bill that will come over here after the other body concludes its deliberations, what it is their plain duty to do—to declare an emergency in specific terms and call a spade a spade. If they had the courage today they would say what is in their minds, many of them—and that is from their viewpoint that we should declare war on Germany. That is what many of you are thinking in your minds today. However, you do not take into consideration the situation abroad. You do not take into consideration the prospects of starvation for millions over there in Europe this winter. You do not take into consideration the "fifth column" that we hear so much about that is in Poland, France, Belgium, and the Low Lands, who are going to be active, perhaps, and will probably cause the dictators with their strange ideologies to do all they possibly can to subdue the warring factions within the orbit over there. They have trouble of their own over there. But a wave of hysteria has gone through the country that we are about to be invaded. The same group of warmongers are active again as they were in 1917. It will be recalled, they said to some Members of this Congress on this floor on that Good Friday night, 1917, when we declared war—those who spoke for the administration then said, "Why, it is only a bluff to fool the Kaiser. None of our boys are going to go across. The war will be over in 90 days." Then, "Come up and see me about that postmastership"—the old bait of patronage was thrown out as it always has been when politics comes before patriotism. We have gone through that. We know the history of the last war. I do not think we ought to lose our balance. This is a war to insure British imperialism, if you will. The mother of fascism, the mother of communism, the mother of nazi-ism. There would be no Hitler today, there would be no Mussolini today, there would be no Stalin with his cruel, cold-blooded Godless philosophy except for the imperialism of Britain. We know that and we ought be concerned with what is best for the United States, rather than Great Britain or any other nation.

The game is once again to get America, the long-lost child of Britain involved in the present war.

Over in London they assume now we are a colony of Great Britain; that their Navy protected us. From what? Oh, they said, "One emergency after another we protected you with our Atlantic Fleet while you guarded the Pacific to take care of your colonial possessions, Hawaii and the Philippine Islands." They ask now, with outstretched arms, to send 50 of our ships over there. There are men in this House who believe we ought to do that, despite the fact that some of our naval experts say we cannot even afford to send a rowboat over there. We have gone mad, gone insane in our desire to support the so-called "mother country," the only country that will get us into war, Great Britain, the Nation that took our blood and our money in the last war and left us holding the bag. Make no mistake about that. We are not concerned with the immoral philosophy of Hitler or any other dictator. We condemn it. It is diametrically opposed to our free institutions and the American way of life, but we do not make these Hitlers; we do not make these Stalins; we do not make these Mussolinis. There is no obligation on the part of the United States Government to unmake them. That is my personal judgment as a Member of Congress and as an American citizen. I believe in military training. If this bill only provided that training, all right, but it is adroitly fixed up and cleverly arranged so that our Guard can go anywhere in the Western Hemisphere where incidents may arise that will throw us into war. My good friend, the gentleman from Texas [Mr. THOMASON], for whom I have the greatest admiration, says by implication that we are bound to aid with our soldiers because of the concord made at Habana with the South American republics. We were talking about cartels in Habana and trade in general. That is the only thing we have to fear in this country, the penetration of trade in South America by certain European nations. So this Conference was called for that purpose. I do not recall that the result of this conference is tantamount to a treaty. The United States, of course, has to pass upon that in due time until it is ratified by the Senate. Stop this talk of sending our ships and our boys to South America. [Applause.]

Mr. ARENDS. Mr. Chairman, I yield 5 minutes to the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. VORYS].

Mr. VORYS of Ohio. Mr. Chairman, in this bill we are making a mole hill out of a mountain. We have the opportunity here to have wholesale volunteering or wholesale drafting. By the adoption of one small amendment and by our votes on that amendment we can take our choice, and it will not make any difference from a military standpoint; but we get the chance on this bill to tell where we stand, to show how we feel on the principle of compulsory service of part of our citizens in time of peace.

The National Guard volunteered under certain conditions: They were to be called out in time of peace by the Governor of their State, in time of national emergency declared by Congress by their President. We have the power to change the law and to draft them in peacetime—that is the proposal—just as we have the power to change our law and to draft citizens who are not in the National Guard.

Mr. ANDREWS. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. VORYS of Ohio. I hope the gentleman will not interrupt my statement. When I have concluded I shall be pleased to yield if I have time.

Mr. Chairman, what we are going to do here is to have a wholesale draft of the National Guard whose members volunteered for a different kind of service. Let us not talk about training. This bill specifically provides that this is to be active military service. Such service has been had by our troops time and again in the past without any declaration of war. That is what we are calling them in for.

In the other body an amendment which would have permitted voluntary resignations was defeated by 11 votes. In our committee an amendment squinting in that direction but still preserving the draft power was put in the bill. At the appropriate time an amendment will be offered to give us a chance to see this thing clearly and to express our sentiments. This amendment will be as follows—page 5, line 3:

(d) Any member of any Reserve component of the Army shall be discharged upon his own request made within 20 days of the date of his being ordered into the active military service of the United States.

It is not going to make any difference from a military standpoint. General Williams told the committee that in his estimation 97 percent of the National Guard want to be called out for training or for service. This draft affects only 3 percent of the guard if he is correct in his figures.

We have 120,000 Reserve officers. This is enough officers for an army of 2,400,000 men. We need no such number of officers. We can afford to let those who, when the law is changed, when the contract is changed, want to say, "No; I don't want to go"—we can afford to let them stay. We can afford to take care of the situation I have heard about on this floor in the last hour of a boy who is finishing his R. O. T. C. training in college but who is a member of the National Guard. He would prefer to stay in the R. O. T. C. We can, by adopting this small amendment, permit that boy to decide that he will continue with his R. O. T. C. unit instead of going in the guard. Now, let us get it straight; on military technical matters the General Staff of the Army should control; on the question of training, the number of men we need, we should defer to the Army. On questions of getting the men, of securing trainees, the Army is our servant, not our master. Let us hold that distinction clearly in our minds, and let us say as a message abroad to the totalitarian states: "Yes; we are arming; but we are arming our way, not yours. We can defeat you with democratic methods as opposed to your totalitarian methods. We do not have to adopt those totalitarian methods in order to defend our country." [Applause.]

Mr. MAY. Mr. Chairman, I yield 10 minutes to the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. FADDIS].

Mr. FADDIS. Mr. Chairman, now that those who delight in panning the administration have done so, and now that those who delight in twisting the lion's tail have satisfied themselves in that respect, perhaps it would be well to get down to the meat of this bill and consider it from a practical viewpoint. Just what is the occasion for this legislation? It is training for one of the components of the Army of the United States.

In 1916 President Wilson called the National Guard for service on the Mexican border. Prior to that time I had served two enlistments in the National Guard of Pennsylvania. I reenlisted in order to go to the border, because I firmly believed that within a very short time we were going to face an emergency and I believed that the training I would receive in connection with serving in the National Guard would be of benefit to me and that afterward I might possibly be of some use to the Nation. As I look back on my experiences in those years, and as I look back on my experiences in the World War overseas I realize what a wise move that was on the part of President Wilson when he put the National Guard on the Mexican border. He put them in the very best place he could to train them.

Mr. BROOKS. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FADDIS. Not until I have completed my statement.

They received the greatest training that was possible to give them, and anyone who served in France can remember that he hardly ever saw a temporary officer who did not wear the green and gold campaign badge of Mexican border service. Now, did President Wilson place the National Guard on the Mexican border to guard against inroads of Mexican bandits into Texas, New Mexico, and Arizona? Certainly so far as Texas was concerned the Texas Rangers were amply able to guard the borders of that State. But they were put there by a farsighted man who knew the value that would accrue from that kind of service.

A great deal of misunderstanding exists with regard to training men for military service. A great many people believe you can train men in armories, or that you can train them in R. O. T. C. units in school. This simply cannot be done. They can, it is true, be given a certain amount of elementary training in connection with a program of that kind. Nevertheless, they cannot receive the training that is so essential to them when later on they may take the field, training that will prove the salvation of many of those men if they are ever to be called into active service. In the R. O. T. C. school, or in armory drills, it is impossible for men to learn to live in the field as men must live during terms of active service. Men must learn to live in the field in order that they may learn so to conduct themselves that they will not die off as a result of their own indiscretions and mistakes. There was a day in the history of our Nation when our population was largely rural and you could take men from the lives they were leading and put them in the field. They were able to stand the rigors of life in the field. But that is not true today. We are too soft as a nation.

If you take men, as Kipling said, and rush them raw into battle or raw into camp, if you please, as they are picked raw from the street, they will not know enough to live an outdoor life, such as soldiers live. They must go through a period of training to enable them to live that life and to enable them to exist under it. After they have undergone this training, after they have had instilled into them some of the fundamentals that are so necessary to life in the field they will thrive upon it; but until they have had that period of training they are, you may say, at the mercy of the elements. Therefore, it is necessary that troops, before they are exposed to active service, receive this period of hardening that they can get in no other manner. That is one of the reasons for the calling of the National Guard at this time.

If you will pardon a little story. At one time while I was a captain I had a lieutenant assigned to me. He was a very fine boy, very intelligent, eager to do his duty, eager to learn, a graduate of an R. O. T. C. school and in every respect he had the makings of a mighty fine officer. But he had no practical experience in handling men. He joined the company as a second lieutenant and, as is customary, was assigned in charge of the mess of the men. A few days after he had been assigned to be in charge of the mess, he came up to see me and he said, "Captain, do you know this company is using an awful lot of lemon extract?" I said, "What do you mean?" He said, "Why, the first day I was in charge of that mess I got 2 gallons of lemon extract." He said, "The cooks told me they were out. That was 4 days ago, and now I find that all of the lemon extract is gone." I said, "Have you been checking up on the sobriety of your cooks?" He said, "What do you mean, Captain?" I said, "The fact of the matter is the cooks have been making highballs out of your lemon extract." He said, "Nobody would drink lemon extract, would they?"

That is just an illustration. The boy had not learned enough about the Army yet to know that the cooks could make highballs out of his lemon extract if he gave them the opportunity to do so. Those of us who have seen action in France have memories all too vivid of insufficiently trained troops being put into action. We know that in such cases the losses were excessively heavy and we will never see the like again. We certainly hope and pray that we are facing no emergency today that will make such conditions possible, but no one can guarantee that we are not. If we draw into active service this great component of the Army, the National Guard of the United States, men who have enlisted for the purpose of serving their country under any circumstances, we are calling into service and into training men who may need this training later on.

If anyone could guarantee that we would never need them, of course, we would not call them into service, or if anyone could guarantee that we would never need them, we would not need a National Guard organization. So, let us look at this piece of legislation from its practical standpoint and get ready to give these men the training to which they are entitled if they are ever to be called upon to do the duty which they entered the service of their Nation to perform?

Mr. PATRICK. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FADDIS. I yield to the gentleman from Alabama.

Mr. PATRICK. The gentleman is one of the Members of the House who has great acquaintance with military affairs, and I think every Member has great confidence in his ability along that line. Can the gentleman conceive how any Member of this House who is opposed to the compulsory draft measure can also oppose this measure?

Mr. FADDIS. I cannot conceive how any Member of this House could oppose training the National Guard whether or not he may be opposed to the draft measure.

Mr. PATRICK. If he hopes to forestall the draft, then this would perhaps be the only measure by which he could possibly hope to accomplish results.

Mr. FADDIS. That is true. [Applause.]

Mr. ARENDS. Mr. Chairman, I yield 5 minutes to the gentleman from California [Mr. HINSHAW].

Mr. HINSHAW. Mr. Chairman, in the few remarks I shall make I want it understood that I have no intention whatever of casting aspersions upon the patriotism or the high-minded ideals of any man or woman in this body or any other person in the United States in high or low position. These remarks are my own and express my own ideas, and those of no one else, unless they may happen to agree.

I make that first statement because I myself, in the last war, was a volunteer, and that before war was declared; but I was accepted in the service on the 8th of May, 1917, and served 29 months, 12 of them in the A. E. F. I respect the views of every patriotic American, whether or not they run with mine.

When I look at this bill and listen to the proponents of it, I wonder a few things; and if anyone chooses to answer any of these remarks that I make I shall be very happy. It is said that this is a bill for the training of the National Guard. I call your attention to the language in line 10 of the first page, in which it is stated that the National Guard and the Reserves are to be ordered into active service—

For the strengthening of the national defense.

I wish those words read: "For the training of the National Guard and Reserve forces," as we and the people have been given to understand this bill intends.

Mr. MAY. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HINSHAW. I yield to the gentleman from Kentucky, able chairman of the Committee on Military Affairs.

Mr. MAY. Does not a well-trained soldier better strengthen the national defense than a poorly trained soldier?

Mr. HINSHAW. I would agree to that, I may say to the chairman of the committee, and I would concur in this language wholeheartedly, if it had not been said by some important members of the gentleman's Committee on Military Affairs that these troops may, under this bill, be sent into Brazil, Uruguay, Canada, or any other portion of the Western Hemisphere outside the continental limits and possessions of the United States, without the further authority of the Congress. They would not be sent into those countries for any purpose other than to suppress insurrection or something of that nature, or to ward off or defeat an attack by some foreign nation, in which case we would deem warlike action necessary under the Monroe Doctrine.

Mr. MAY. The gentleman has had military experience, of course—training in the Army. I wonder what he would do if he were stationed along the lower side of the St. Lawrence River and found that a "fifth column" group was setting up mechanized equipment and artillery on the other side of the river?

Mr. HINSHAW. Mr. Chairman, I cannot be scared by any such picture. I would say that if the Canadians had not already found that out and told us about it, somebody had better look into the Canadians.

Mr. MAY. Suppose it were a foreign foe that had overcome the Canadians?

Mr. HINSHAW. I believe we would probably have heard about that in plenty of time for the Congress of the United States to declare a regular emergency or to declare war on any nation that so violated the Monroe Doctrine or even contemplated doing so. It could hardly be kept secret. That is my answer to that. I believe we would know about it. The Congress should remain in session, and I for one want to have it remain in session. If we could not act on that, between the House and the Senate, in 30 minutes, I do not understand the situation at all. That is what bothers me about this bill. I want the National Guard to have its training. I agree with the members of the committee that it is insane folly to send any troops against trained troops unless those troops themselves are trained. It is insane folly to do that. It is also criminal to send young men against trained troops when they themselves are not trained and equipped. To that extent I favor this bill, and for that reason I have voted for these vast appropriations for national defense.

I do wish, however, that those who, like the gentleman who preceded me, the gentleman from Pennsylvania, Colonel FADDIS, who want to go again and lick the Kaiser or someone like that, could have their enthusiasm a little bit curbed. In other words, if there would be a bit less antagonism expressed at this time on the part of American citizens, officials high and low, and others, and a little more attention paid to the internal concerns of the United States, I would feel a lot happier about this whole defense program. That is my attitude. It is folly and an invitation to disaster to pick a fight, certainly a year before you are ready to even decently protect yourself.

I want to go now to another subject. I cannot find in this bill any place a requirement that these men take a physical examination before they are accepted into the active service of the United States. Yesterday I happened to be in the office of General Hines on a matter in connection with a veteran who is in the tubercular ward of a hospital in my district. He explained to me that in conversations with other members of the Government he had said that the services and facilities of the Veterans' Administration, their examining boards, the hospitals, and so forth, could very well be put to good purpose, and that with these facilities available every soldier could and should be given a thorough physical examination before he be admitted into the military service. [Applause.]

Mr. ARENDS. Mr. Chairman, I yield 5 minutes to the gentleman from Montana [Mr. THORKELSON].

Mr. THORKELSON. Mr. Chairman, I am opposed to the part of the bill that gives the President power to send the National Guard as far south as the Antarctic Ocean and as far north as the Arctic Ocean, from Cape Horn to the borders of the Arctic and Bering Sea, in the Western Hemisphere. The Constitution does not provide such power to be given to the President. I now quote a part of that document:

To provide for calling forth the militia to execute the laws of the Union, suppress insurrections, and repel invasions; to provide for organizing, arming, and disciplining the militia, and for governing such part of them as may be employed in the service of the United States, reserving to the States, respectively, the appointment of the officers, and the authority of training the militia according to the discipline prescribed by Congress.

A well-regulated militia, being necessary to the security of a free state, the right of the people to keep and bear arms, shall not be infringed.

It is quite clear from the Constitution itself that there is no provision for Congress to give the President the power to send the National Guard out of the United States. There is no necessity for it, because we are not in danger of invasion and are still at peace. We are not going to be invaded by anyone. Invasion is a difficult thing. If you recall the World War, England could not invade Gallipoli, and in this war England could not invade Norway even after such a short time as 12 hours of occupation by the German Army.

Today Germany is hesitating about invading England, and I do not believe that Germany will be able to invade England today in spite of the fact that the distance between Calais and Dover is only 22 miles. Now, it is certain from that that she cannot invade the United States.

Let me recall the World War to you a little bit——

Mr. ANDREWS. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. THORKELSON. I gladly yield to the gentleman from New York.

Mr. ANDREWS. The gentleman will admit that it is possible that Germany might overcome Britain.

Mr. THORKELSON. I will say yes; she may blockade Britain by air, as she is now doing, with airplanes and the small submarines, but let me admit even the worst of it and if Germany should conquer England or the British Isles, she has not conquered the British Empire, because that is only a small fraction of the British Empire and Germany could not conquer the British Empire whether she occupied England or not.

Mr. ANDREWS. If she should conquer the British Isles, what disposition would be made of the islands like Bermuda, the Bahamas, and her other outlying insular possessions?

Mr. THORKELSON. I will say to the gentleman that I believe it is our duty to consolidate the North American continent and I have already proposed such a proposition here in the House.

In 1914 we knew that we would be involved in the World War. Admiral Sims, who was then in charge of the Navy, knew it and he so reported to his superior officers. In 1914 we were already in the war and the money was furnished by J. P. Morgan & Co. to England at that time. During the early part of the World War we sent Red Cross units to Germany and to France and to England and we showed by such acts that we were absolutely neutral. Today we are not. We are simply obsessed with hate and we want to help one side, which is a clear indication that we are not neutral. We remained neutral in the World War until 1917, when the British propaganda machine came over here under the direction of Mr. Parker and Lord Northcliff and started this propaganda. What was the question in issue at that time?

Mr. THORKELSON. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to revise and extend my remarks in the RECORD.

Mr. EDELSTEIN. Mr. Chairman, I object to that request.

Mr. ARENDS. Mr. Chairman, I yield 5 minutes to the gentleman from Connecticut [Mr. MILLER].

Mr. MILLER. Mr. Chairman, if there is one thing that an officer of the Army dreads more than another, it is the thought that he might some day be called upon to lead untrained troops into battle. For this reason I believe that we should give the National Guard an opportunity to secure adequate training, that we should do it as speedily as possible. No more patriotic group of citizens live in the United States than the members of the guard. If it were necessary to have that proven to me, I had that proof offered a week ago Saturday when, through some misunderstanding, an order came into Connecticut ordering the various commanders of National Guard units not to take to camp men employed in the Pratt & Whitney aircraft factory. It caused a good deal of confusion on that Saturday morning, but it is interesting to note that several of these men holding good positions in these days when unemployment is so prevalent, said that they would give up their jobs in the aircraft factory before they would give up the opportunity for these 3 weeks of training.

So I believe wholeheartedly in providing this training. I believe the officers and the enlisted men want it, but there is a difference of opinion, and a very honest difference of opinion, among the members of the guard themselves whether this authority should be extended to provide that they can be sent anywhere in the Western Hemisphere. I believe we should confine their training program.

The first doubt as to the wisdom of voting for this bill was raised in my mind a few minutes ago by the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. FADDIS] when he said that he complimented President Wilson for his far-sightedness in sending the National Guard to the Mexican border in 1916. I do not believe that President Wilson had that thought in mind. I do not believe that he deliberately misled the American people because not one word was printed at that time to indicate that the National Guard or our troops were at the border for any other purpose than to put down a revolution that was going on, and I would hate to think that at that time we were misled and that the Mexican expedition was a training program in preparation for our entry into the World War the next year. I have always believed that President Wilson was sincere in his efforts to keep us out of war and I would hate to think now that months before we entered the war he was setting up this training program. That raises this doubt in my mind, and if I thought for 1 minute that any plan was organized or thought of to send these troops into another war, whether it would be in this hemisphere or not, without the approval of Congress, much as I think they need the training, I would not vote for it.

I have sent to the Clerk's desk an amendment that would limit this to a training program, and would limit their service to the continental limits of the United States, our island possessions, Alaska and the Canal Zone. I believe if any emergency arises that makes it necessary to go further than that, that the Congress of the United States will be here or can get here, because in this day of rapid transportation we could assemble a quorum of the Congress in 36 hours, and have men from California here in Washington.

I have another amendment at the Clerk's desk, to be offered at the proper time, which I think is a precaution. I believe that every man called into the training program, whether the National Guard or a Reserve officer, should be given at the time of his entry into the service a thorough physical examination. If any physical defects are discovered and he is permitted to go in, he should be given at that time a record of those defects, and when he leaves at the end of the year's service every man called into the service should be given a medical certificate with his discharge stating definitely the illnesses for which he has been treated while he was in the service, the injuries, if any, and the hospitalization, if any, so that we will not again have the experience which we have had in the past several years trying to correct records. If a man is given that statement himself, then it is his responsibility, if he has any disability incurred in the service, to keep that certificate. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Connecticut has expired.

Mr. SMITH of Connecticut. Mr. Chairman, I yield 5 minutes to the gentleman from Oklahoma [Mr. FERGUSON].

Mr. FERGUSON. Mr. Chairman, you do not have to be an expert on military affairs to know that the lightning attacks carried against the countries of Europe were mathematically and strategically figured to the last degree. Poland, Holland, Belgium, Norway, and France were attacked because Germany knew the exact strength they had, the exact strength of the country to be overrun.

The military leaders, the espionage or spy system, if you want to call it that, of the dictator nations—Italy, Germany, Japan, and Russia—know the exact strength of the armed forces of our defense; know the exact strength of every nation in this hemisphere. They know our ability to protect every nation in this hemisphere. The only way we can preserve peace is to actually have the armed, equipped, and trained forces that will forestall any attack.

As I said before, with the warring nations now in operation, everyone knows the mechanical precision with which the countries of Europe were conquered. When the strategists, the military leaders of the dictator nations, figure mathematically and scientifically the possibility of a successful attack we must have an armed force that makes the answer to such a planned attack a definite "no." I realize the political temptation to take a chance on this Nation's welfare by opposing this bill and the conscription bill. There will be enough Members of Congress to pass this, and, I hope, the conscription legislation. This will bring our armed force to the place we can enjoy peace, freedom of attack. Then those that played politics with our country's defenses can justify their position by saying "I told you so; we have not been attacked"; when the real truth of the matter is that the only way to avoid attack in the Western Hemisphere is to make it too tough to be tackled by an ambitious dictator nation.

I think we should look this bill we are considering today squarely in the face. These men are not only being taken for training; they are being taken into the forces of the United States Army, and they are not taken in for training only; they increase our forces which we vitally need at this time, and they are in the regularly armed forces of this Nation while they are serving that period of 1 year. Even under this bill, with 55,000 men being taken in immediately, our armed forces will be increased to only 318,000 men—318,000 men— with the greatest coast line of any nation in the world to defend. That armed force will not be the answer that forbids an attack from without.

Mr. Chairman, I have heard several Members express their opposition to conscription. You are voting today, and a great majority of this House will vote for this bill, which gives the President power to call into the service 242,000 National Guard and some 110,000 Reserve officers. You are saying to these men, this is an emergency, and certainly it must be an emergency or we would not exercise the power to call these men in to augment our forces. That proves the emergency is here. We are calling these men who have devoted—some of them for many years—a period once a week to training and 3 or 4 nights a week to study and 2 weeks a year at camp. We are saying to them, you were patriotic, you wanted to prepare yourselves against the day when your country is in an emergency, and so we are going to call you into the service. We say to them that they will not suffer, that their families will get along fine, because they are patriotic. We say to them that they prepared themselves, and yet the Members of Congress today who vote to send these men into the service, and I am certainly in favor of it, in a few days will oppose conscription. I know this will be true because in the other body only 7 votes were cast against this bill, yet many Members are now opposing conscription.

You say that the social and economic life of the man who has made no effort to prepare himself must not be disturbed, but that the man who has made a personal sacrifice we will not hesitate to call into the service, and he will not hesitate to go. Can this House afford to draw that distinction and put that premium on thoughtlessness, on noninterest in his country's defense? Can we afford to vote for this bill and then fail to pass a conscription bill that is necessary to bring our forces up to the place where we can say to the world, and the mathematical precision of the dictator nations will get the answer, that they cannot afford to attack this Nation?

Mr. WOODRUM of Virginia. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FERGUSON. Yes.

Mr. WOODRUM of Virginia. I know the gentleman is very modest, and I hope it will not embarrass the gentleman if I record the fact that I happen to know the gentleman practices what he preaches. The gentleman is a distinguished officer in the United States Marine Corps Reserves and in a few days will entrain with the Marine Reserves for a period of training. I think that ought to be put into the RECORD in connection with the gentleman's remarks. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Oklahoma has expired.

Mr. ARENDS. Mr. Chairman, I yield 5 minutes to the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. JOHNS].

Mr. JOHNS. Mr. Chairman, I have listened with a great deal of interest to the debate on this bill. I have been wondering, as I have listened, what the National Guard of the different States has been doing for the last 15 or 20 years. I am wondering if they are not familiar with the methods of warfare that are being employed by the different countries today. If they are not, it is about time we got some new generals or somebody to train them.

I received a letter from an officer in the World War, a distinguished member of the bar of the State of Wisconsin, and to me it is one of the most sensible I have read on this subject of calling out the National Guard for proper defense. I want to read a portion of it:

Having taken an active interest in the events during the period of preparation for the last war, and having served in the Army for 23 months in 1917 and 1918, first with a National Guard division of volunteers, the Thirty-second, and then with a division of drafted men, the Seventy-eighth, I have a few ideas on the subject.

I think everyone agrees that, regardless of the outcome in Europe, the surest way to keep this country out of war is to be thoroughly prepared for it. But to call out the National Guard at this time, or at any time until it is absolutely needed for active service, is ridiculous. The National Guard, at least in Wisconsin, and I am quite sure in all of the Eastern and Middle West States, is in a fair state of preparation right now, and calling them to camp will not do any good until equipment is ready for them. They can drill with what equipment they have right in their home towns, and without disturbing their home life or causing them to lose their jobs.

Modern warfare requires specialists, and specialists must attend schools, not camps for drill. In the last war we drilled from July 1, 1917, until we landed in France in March 1918, with very meager equipment. We never saw the guns we fired in France until we arrived in France, and what we learned about firing data in this country was discarded when we got our guns in France. Then everyone was rushed into schools of various kinds, and we tried to learn in a few weeks what, if we had competent teachers with an agreed program, we could have learned here without even leaving our home cities.

In my estimation, first of all we must have a defense plan. Let it be determined what planes, guns, tanks, and other motorized equipment are needed, and let contracts be let to produce them. Next, form schools for instructors, so that when the equipment is delivered there will be qualified officers to take charge of it and instruct the recruits in the use of it.

A certain amount of close order drill is necessary for disciplinary purposes, but the Army has plenty of excellent drillmasters who can turn out a first-class foot soldier in 1 month's time. But it takes months, if not years, to turn out a good mechanic. In the railroad-shop service an apprentice must work 3 years before he can qualify as a mechanic.

I think registration for the draft in the very near future is O. K., but the draft should really be one of selective service, and no one should be called out until he is really needed. I would like to see every boy from 16 up registered for the draft, and as soon as it is determined how many men are needed for special services, and schools are established to teach them, let the 16-, 17-, and 18-year-old boys who are not attending school otherwise be called up and sent to Army schools so that at the end of a year or two they will be really skilled mechanics.

Of course, the National Guard and the R. O. T. C. should be exempt from the draft, as well as all boys who are taking Army training courses in high schools and colleges. These are getting excellent training now and can be called upon for work as instructors as soon as delivery of equipment commences, and schools are opened. These schools need not be centralized. In fact, the more the better, because a small group can be instructed far better than a larger group. Give the National Guard and R. O. T. C. men a chance to qualify as instructors; let them volunteer to go to school so as to qualify as instructors, and let them conduct the schools in their home areas.

My information is that the German Army was trained right at home. The recruit ate and slept in his own home, worked part time, and had regular hours to report for drill and instruction. It seems to me that that is a very good idea.

To summarize:

1. Let us have a thorough defense plan.
2. Let the contracts for equipment.
3. Educate officers for instructors.
4. Call up by the draft the young men from 16 up who have no jobs and who are not already in school, and put them into schools for specialists, with the provision that they will not be called into active duty until they are at least 18 years old.
5. Take no one away from his job until it is absolutely necessary. Insist that every man between 18 and 30 receive some sort of military training, but let it be a part-time program, permitting him to hold his job at home as long as possible. I have an idea there will be enough volunteers for the Air Service so that none need be drafted for that branch.

That letter was written to me by Walter T. Bie, of Green Bay, Wis., in my home district.

I also quote very briefly from a letter received from Mrs. George Wettengel, one of my constituents. Before I read from her letter I may say that she has traveled extensively in Europe, making a yearly trip to Europe during the past 7 or 8 years. She is more familiar with conditions there than perhaps anyone on the floor of the House, and what she has to say is of very great importance to those not informed with reference to conditions in Europe. I may say also that she has but recently returned from South America where she spent 2 months studying conditions. Her comments are of great value because of the background of knowledge behind them. In her letter she says this:

You know I have been in Europe enough to know of the political situations there, and the guard bill, the conscription bill, and the money draft bill, are copies of laws in force in the dictator countries. Instead of sending money and ships to England we had better mend our fences in South America. I have just returned from a 2-months' trip. If Germany comes to America it will be by the way of South America in which it is becoming more firmly entrenched each day.

Mr. ARENDS. Mr. Chairman, I yield 5 minutes to the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. SMITH].

Mr. SMITH of Ohio. Mr. Chairman, I must object to this measure as it is presented to the House. First, it violates a contract made between the Government and the members of the National Guard.

The men who enlisted in the guard did so with a definite understanding on their part that they enlisted for a period of 3 years. They enlisted with the idea that they were expected to give about 2 weeks of their time each year for training. While the language of the statute does not place a specific limitation on the time required for training, it does in substance certainly imply as much. This is what the statute says:

Under such regulations as the Secretary of War shall prescribe, each company, troop, battery, and detachment in the National Guard shall assemble for drill and instruction, including indoor target practice, not less than 48 times each year, and shall, in addition thereto, participate in encampments, maneuvers, or other exercises including outdoor target practice, at least 15 days in training each year.

Not only was it the understanding of the man who enlisted in the guard that he was doing so with the idea of spending but a few weeks in training each year, but that was also the universal practice of the guard throughout the country. Indeed everyone understood it to be that way.

Now comes the Congress with this proposal to arbitrarily abolish that contract and understanding and say to the boys of the guard, "The contract which you had with the Government when you enlisted has ended. You no longer have any voice in the matter, you have nothing more to say about it. Instead of a contract you just take orders. These orders are that you will be placed in a military camp for training for 1 year. You are also to be put at the service of the Government to be sent anywhere in the United States or our possessions, including the Philippine Islands. Or you may be sent to Mexico, Brazil, or any part of South America, as far as Cape Horn, 7,000 miles from our eastern shore." That is what this law says which we are proposing now to pass. I ask you, Is this right?

It has been seriously argued here on the floor that the members of the National Guard understood when they enlisted they might be called upon at any time to do these very things. That, therefore, no contract between the Government and them will be violated. That positively is not true. The law is very clear upon this point. Section 111 of the National Defense Act, "Ordering National Guard of the United States Into Federal Service," reads in part as follows:

When Congress shall have declared a national emergency and shall have authorized the use of armed land forces of the United States for any purpose requiring the use of troops in excess of those of the Regular Army, the President may, under such regulations, * * * order into the active military service of the United States, to serve therein for the period of the war or emergency, unless sooner relieved, any or all units and (the) members (thereof) of the National Guard of the United States.

What possibly could be clearer than this? It is only if and when Congress shall have declared a national emergency exists that the guard can be called into the service which this bill provides. That is the legal contract the National Guard had with the Government, but Congress has not declared that any national emergency exists. The very purpose of this part of the law was to provide that the guard could be called into Federal service only in case an emergency actually existed, and then only if that emergency had been so declared by Congress.

I consider this point most vital. If Congress believes an emergency exists and it is necessary to call out the National Guard for Federal service, then Congress should be forthright enough to stand up and declare its existence. But Congress is not doing this. Congressmen are seeking to evade the terms under which enlistment in the guard took place by simply claiming the members of the guard when they enlisted expected they might be called to do that which this bill calls for, without Congress having declared the necessity of calling the guard, by first declaring the existence of an emergency.

In my opinion we do a grave wrong when we pass legislation of this kind. I think the most sacred contract any government can enter into is the one which it makes between itself and the men who shoulder the responsibility of protecting our Nation in time of war. Confidence of the people and the soldiers in their government is one of the most vital factors for success in any armed conflict. To do what is proposed in this bill certainly will not engender confidence in government.

This bill also is wrong in that it gives the Chief Executive the power to send the National Guard out of the continental United States or its territorial possessions. There is no good reason for this. The President himself, according to press reports, made the statement a few days ago "That the chances are 100 to 1 against American regular troops or National Guard men being assigned to active service outside of the continental United States or its possessions." If the President believes this, upon what possible ground can he now ask for this extraordinary power to call the guard into Federal service and send them anywhere into the Western Hemisphere?

Mr. MAY. I have no further speakers, Mr. Chairman. The Clerk may read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, etc., That during the period ending June 30, 1942, the President be, and is hereby, authorized from time to time to order into the active military service of the United States for a period of 12 consecutive months each, any or all members and units of any or all Reserve components of the Army of the United States, and retired personnel of the Regular Army, with or without their consent, to such extent and in such manner as he may deem necessary for the strengthening of the national defense: Provided, That the members and units of the Reserve components of the Army of the United States ordered into active Federal service under this authority shall not be employed beyond the limits of the Western Hemisphere except in the Territories and possessions of the United States, including the Philippine Islands.

Mr. MAY. Mr. Chairman, I offer a committe amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. MAY: Page 1, line 7, after the word "of", strike out the words "any or all Reserve components" and insert "the National Guard and the Organized Reserves."

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, the amendment will be agreed to.

There was no objection, and the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. DONDERO. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word.

Mr. Chairman, I am not a military man nor do I pose as a military expert. I can bring nothing to this debate of a military nature.

The purpose of the bill before us, Senate Joint Resolution 286, is the calling out of the National Guard into active military service. There is a great deal of honest difference of opinion as to whether or not this is necessary, but whether it be necessary or not, those of us who are opposed to compulsory military training in time of peace, and I am opposed to it, can find in this bill a good reason why we should support this bill. In supporting this bill we are doing nothing more or less than calling into the service of the United States an auxiliary branch of the national defense to reinforce our Regular Army. If we make a mistake in this particular we are making it on the side of defense of the country.

The Chief of Staff has said, and undoubtedly he is one of the best military authorities in the Nation, that if he had 480,000 men well equipped and fully trained he could prevent any nation on this earth from landing one corps of troops on our shores, even though they had command of the seas. I do not know whether that is true or not, but I am willing to accept the judgment of the Chief of Staff.

On one occasion we had a President whose hands were very familiar with the feel of an ax handle. He made a statement which supports in some measure that made by the Chief of Staff, General Marshall, a statement which may be of some interest today, because it was made more than 75 years ago. I read that statement made by Abraham Lincoln:

> Shall we expect some trans-Atlantic military giant to step the ocean and crush us at a blow? Never! All the armies of Europe, Asia, and Africa combined with all the treasure of the earth (our own excepted) in their military chest, with a Bonaparte for a commander, could not by force take a drink from the Ohio or make a track on the Blue Ridge in a trial of a thousand years.

That comes from out of the past. I realize that world conditions were different then. Lincoln had faith in the patriotism of the American people. His faith is sustained by the record which shows that out of nearly 3,000,000 men who were enrolled in the Union Army during the Civil War only 1 in 10 was enrolled as a result of the draft. This bill would reinforce the Regular Army with sufficient men to provide an army large enough, in the opinion of the Chief of Staff, to defend our country against invasion.

I do not believe that under this bill any boy under 18 years of age should be called into the military service. In the minute or two that I have I am not prepared to discuss every detail of the bill, and I conclude by saying that in my judgment we ought to pass this bill and provide adequate defense which would make conscription in peacetime unnecessary in this country.

Mr. BULWINKLE. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DONDERO. I yield.

Mr. BULWINKLE. Will the gentleman tell me under what provision of law in any State, or under what provision of Federal law anyone under 18 years of age does enlist?

Mr. DONDERO. I am basing my statement upon the arguments presented on the floor of the House today on this bill.

Mr. BULWINKLE. I have had a lot of experience, and I have never seen a man enlisted under 18 years of age unless he misstated his age.

Mr. DONDERO. I hope the gentleman from North Carolina is correct in his statement.

Mr. HINSHAW. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DONDERO. I yield.

Mr. HINSHAW. Answering the gentleman from North Carolina I may say that a young man may enlist in the National Guard of California at the age of 16 with the consent of his parents.

Mr. BULWINKLE. That is prohibited under the Federal law.

Mr. HINSHAW. But such boys are there nevertheless, my friend.

Mr. VAN ZANDT. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DONDERO. I yield.

Mr. VAN ZANDT. He can enlist in the State militia. That, however, is not recognized by the Federal Government.

By unanimous consent the pro forma amendment was withdrawn.

Mr. SMITH of Ohio. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

> Amendment offered by Mr. SMITH of Ohio: Page 2, line 1, after the colon, insert the following: "Provided, That members of the National Guard shall not be ordered into active military service under this act without their consent."

Mr. SMITH of Ohio. Mr. Chairman, this amendment does not need much explaining. If the gentleman from Texas [Mr. THOMASON], who so strongly advocates this measure, is correct in his assertion that 90 percent of the men in the National Guard are willing to be called into service, we ought to give them an opportunity to indicate whether they are or are not willing to do this.

I believe this country could raise the necessary number of men for military service by voluntary enlistments, if the people of this country were sure that the increase in the size of our Army is not sought for the purpose of getting us into the war. Assured of that I believe we can secure by voluntary enlistment all the men we need.

As I stated, this is a simple amendment to make it possible for the men in the guard to say whether or not they consider the pending bill a change in the contract of enlistment they entered into, or whether they consider it otherwise.

Mr. VAN ZANDT. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SMITH of Ohio. In just a minute; not at present.

Mr. VAN ZANDT. Does the gentleman understand that when the young man joins the National Guard he first reads the articles of enlistment and then affixes his signature, and that when he does so he agrees to go into the Federal military service if they call him?

Mr. SMITH of Ohio. Provided a national emergency has been declared by Congress. Not otherwise. The law is clear on this point.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Ohio.

The amendment was rejected.

Mr. MASSINGALE. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment, which I send to the Clerk's desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

> Amendment offered by Mr. MASSINGALE: On page 1, line 8, after the words "United States", insert "except young men in the National Guard under the age of 18 years, to each of whom there shall be immediately issued an honorable discharge."

Mr. MASSINGALE. Mr. Chairman, the amendment I have offered is probably poaching a little bit on my friend the gentleman from North Dakota [Mr. BURDICK]. He and I had talked about such amendment. I looked for him and could not find him, so I offered the amendment myself.

There is only one purpose in offering the amendment. It is not right, it is not the desire of the Congress and the people of the United States to force children into the Regular Army. It has been discussed a little bit on the floor just what are the component parts of the National Guard. I do not know what the situation is over the United States, but I do know of my own personal knowledge that in the National Guard of many towns in the Midwest there are a number of boys ranging in age between 16 and 18 years. I know that, and I will tell you how it comes about. An active chamber of commerce in a Midwest town will want an armory. It organizes a National Guard unit and the chamber of commerce gets behind these boys in high school. I understand in my district there is one unit of the National Guard in which better than 60 percent of the boys are under 18 years of age, and I have been told there are some in it who are only 16 years of age. We ought not to take those boys and force them into the United States Army. It is not the proper thing to do.

Mr. WADSWORTH. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MASSINGALE. I yield to the gentleman from New York.

Mr. WADSWORTH. Is the gentleman certain that a boy 15 or 16 in the guard of the State which he represents in part has been federally recognized and receives Federal pay?

Mr. MASSINGALE. I do not know whether he has been federally recognized or not.

Mr. WADSWORTH. If he is not federally recognized, he cannot be ordered to Federal duty.

Mr. MASSINGALE. You may not do things up there in your State like we do in ours.

Mr. WADSWORTH. We have a child-labor law.

Mr. MASSINGALE. We crowd things sometimes down there. There are hundreds of boys in the National Guard of Oklahoma today who are not over 17 years old, and they are there for the purpose of getting a little spending money and getting the opportunity to go off to these camps in the summertime.

Mr. WADSWORTH. The gentleman has not yet answered my question. Under the law, as I understand it——

Mr. MASSINGALE. I know what the law is.

Mr. WADSWORTH. One must be 18 to be legally enlisted in the federally recognized National Guard. The State may add other men of a lower age and carry them on the rolls, but do those men get Federal pay and are they federally recognized?

Mr. MASSINGALE. So far as I know they draw Federal money.

Mr. ANDREWS. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MASSINGALE. I yield to the gentleman from New York.

Mr. ANDREWS. That young man would not be accepted by the Federal Government for service.

Mr. MASSINGALE. I do not care whether he would be accepted or not. Under this bill he is ordered into the Army.

Mr. ANDREWS. He could not be ordered into the Army.

Mr. MASSINGALE. Well, he is.

Mr. ANDREWS. He would not be accepted.

Mr. HINSHAW. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MASSINGALE. I yield to the gentleman from California.

Mr. HINSHAW. I do not know whether officially it is a part of the law in the State of California that I quoted a moment ago. All I know is there are young men in there under 18 years of age who are serving in the National Guard units. Whether they are federally recognized or not, I have not the slightest idea.

Mr. MASSINGALE. I think it is beside the point whether they are federally recognized or not. If they are a part of the National Guard, this bill takes them into the Army.

Suppose they are not federally recognized. This amendment is not going to hurt anybody or anything. It just turns them loose and gives them an honorable discharge when this act goes into effect.

Mr. MAY. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MASSINGALE. I yield to the gentleman from Kentucky.

Mr. MAY. The gentleman says his amendment would give all National Guard men under 18 years of age an honorable discharge.

Mr. MASSINGALE. Yes.

Mr. MAY. Does the gentleman realize that if they enlisted under the age of 18 that they did it by what is known as fraudulent enlistment, in other words, by misrepresentation?

Mr. MASSINGALE. That is something I am not concerned about. The argument has been made here to the effect that Congress should not mess with this stuff but leave it up to the Governor of the State to see to it that boys under 18 are not taken into the Army. I tell you that the Congress has the duty of giving these boys protection, and I am as strong for national defense as is the chairman of the Committee on Military Affairs or anyone else, but we ought to use some common sense and do our duty to every boy who is under 18 years of age at the time this act shall be passed. I do not take any stock in the insinuations made in this debate that a boy committed an offense when he let himself be inducted into the National Guard. Military uniforms, parades, and the meetings at the local armories, and drills during encampments are very alluring to boys along about 16 or 18 years of age. If the boy did wrong, in nearly every instance the military authorities in charge of the National Guard and the R. O. T. C. did wrong in accepting him. I do not know that one has committed a greater offense than the other in accepting him. A man that is capable of being an officer in the National Guard ought to have judgment enough to know when he is dealing with a boy 15 or 16 years old and when he is dealing with a boy 18 years old or older. I do not know whether the boy commits any greater offense, if any offense at all, when he overstates his age to get into the National Guard or the R. O. T. C. than the officer does who accepts him, when he should know the boy to be under age for admission into the National Guard.

Mr. BULWINKLE. Mr. Chairman, I rise in opposition to the amendment.

Mr. Chairman, in order that the gentleman from Oklahoma as well as other gentleman may be enlightened, I shall quote the law on this question:

> The National Guard of each State, Territory, and the District of Columbia shall consist of members of the militia voluntarily enlisted therein who, upon original enlistment, shall not be less than 18 years of age nor more than 45 years of age or who in subsequent enlistments shall be not more than 64 years of age.

When any man stands up here and says that there is a multitude of young men in his district who enlisted when under the age of 18, let me tell you what happened. In the first place, if he is under 21, between 18 and 21, he has to have a certificate from his parent or guardian as to his age. In addition, he himself swears what his age is when he puts it down on the blank.

Mr. BURDICK. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BULWINKLE. I yield to the gentleman from North Dakota.

Mr. BURDICK. What would the gentleman do in a situation where as a matter of fact there are boys in the guard less than 18 years of age?

Mr. BULWINKLE. They have no business in there. They are not legally enlisted. It is true that some fellow can get in who deliberately lies about his age, but when he does so and receives Federal pay for his drill he is receiving money when he is not entitled to it. I tell you right now, with the years of experience in the guard that I have had, that I never say in that entire time in my company any boy under 18 years of age. During the Mexican border trouble we were permitted to enlist them, still with their parent's consent, at 17 years of age. I think you are manifestly upset about a condition that will not exist except possibly in a few cases. If I were the company commander and a man had come to me and deliberately sworn a lie, I would tell him to get out and get out quick. [Applause.]

Mr. THOMAS F. FORD. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word.

Mr. Chairman, in the course of this debate on Senate Joint Resolution 286 it has been repeatedly stated by Members of this body that this resolution grants to the President vast dictator powers. This is, of course, pure nonsense, particularly with reference to calling out the National Guard—State Militia.

I say "pure nonsense," and in support of that I quote the following, first, from article I, section 8, of the Constitution; and, second, from a decision with regard to an act of Congress of February 28, 1795, as follows:

> Article I, section 8: Congress shall have power to provide for calling forth the militia to execute the laws of the Union, suppress insurrections, and repel invasions.

With regard to the delegation of power to the President:

> Act of Congress of February 28, 1795 (1 Stat. 424), delegating to the President power to call forth the militia, held constitutional. Under this act the power to determine when the exigency requiring the calling forth of the militia had arisen was exclusively in the President, and his determination upon this point was conclusive.

[Here the gavel fell.]

Mr. BURDICK. Mr. Chairman, I rise in opposition to the pro forma amendment.

Mr. Chairman, I would not ask you to bear with me in my second appearance here today if I were not interested in this amendment and proposed it myself in my speech before this body. I am glad the gentleman from Oklahoma introduced it, for results and not credit is what we all desire.

In order to get a clear vision of the language this committee has written into the bill, I refer you to subsection (C) on page 3, reading as follows:

> If such position was in the employ of any State or political subdivision thereof it is hereby declared to be the sense of the Congress that such person should be restored to such position or to a position of like seniority status and pay.

Just think a moment and see what this language means. It does not say anything. It is simply fooling these men in the militia. It is the sense of the Congress that the State restore them to their positions. The United States would not have any control over the States whatever, and everybody in this Congress knows it, but you did not say so. You said that it is the sense of the Congress that they restore them to their positions. There is no guaranty that these men will be restored to their positions.

In regard to the remarks of the gentleman from North Carolina, may I say that we are not confronted by a theory but by actual conditions. Suppose we do find young men in the militia less than 18 years of age? What are we going to do about it? The presumption is that they are legally entered in the militia. That is the presumption, and everybody knows it. When they are called out, do they have to rebut this presumption, and if they do, do they have to admit they are guilty of perjury? My position is, let bygones be bygones, and do not take these boys regardless of how they were entered in the first instance. If they are under the age of 18, exclude them, and do not give them a dishonorable discharge, just forget about it and go ahead with our new plan.

Mr. BULWINKLE. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BURDICK. I yield to the gentleman from North Carolina.

Mr. BULWINKLE. It is easy. They can get out before this goes into effect, on their own application.

Mr. BURDICK. Suppose they are confronted with their enlistment record, wherein they stated they were 18. What are you going to do about it?

Mr. BULWINKLE. Regardless of that, they can get out before this goes into effect, with the consent of the Government.

Mr. BURDICK. I do not suppose many of these kids want to get out, but I do not want them in there, and neither does anybody else. Suppose that were the law during the Civil War, how many soldiers would you have had that were legally entered in the Army, North or South?

Mr. KITCHENS. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BURDICK. I yield to the gentleman from Arkansas.

Mr. KITCHENS. Does not the gentleman believe it is better to let them out now than to let them stay in there for a short time and then have their parents get them out?

Mr. BURDICK. Yes.

Mr. KITCHENS. It would save the Federal Government a lot of expense.

Mr. BURDICK. The gentleman is correct.

Mr. RAMSPECK. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BURDICK. I yield to the gentleman from Georgia.

Mr. RAMSPECK. If the amendment offered by the gentleman from Oklahoma is adopted, will it not still be necessary to disclose that these boys have falsified their age, in order for them to take advantage of it?

Mr. BURDICK. The amendment provides that they shall be excluded and honorably discharged.

Mr. RAMSPECK. But the record shows that they are 18 years old. How are you going to determine?

Mr. BURDICK. It is about time that we forget what we have done. If we want to go back far enough and look for law violations, I want to say there are not 10 men in Congress who have not violated some law sometime. Let him who is without sin cast the first stone. If we follow Christ there will not be much stoning done by this Congress.

Mr. SOUTH. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BURDICK. I yield to the gentleman from Texas.

Mr. SOUTH. I believe there is some merit to what the gentleman says, but may I suggest that a child should not be held to the same strict degree of accountability as a grown person? I do not like the expression that a 15- or 16-year-old child has sworn a lie.

Mr. BURDICK. That is right. I believe we ought to protect these young people right now in the very act itself and forget all about prosecutions and everything else. If they are now in the National Guard unlawfully, let them be discharged, and honorably discharged. Let us write the law that way. [Applause.]

[Here the gavel fell.]

Mr. NICHOLS. Mr. Chairman——

Mr. MAY. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that all debate on this section and all amendments thereto close in 5 minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will state to the gentleman that there are several other amendments pending to this section.

Mr. MAY. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that all debate on this section and all amendments thereto close in 20 minutes.

Mr. RABAUT. Mr. Chairman, reserving the right to object, how many amendments are there to this section?

The CHAIRMAN. There are three separate amendments seeking a somewhat similar purpose.

Mr. MILLER. I object, Mr. Chairman.

Mr. MAY. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that all debate on the pending amendment close in 15 minutes.

Mr. MASSINGALE. I object, Mr. Chairman.

Mr. MAY. Mr. Chairman, I move that all debate on this amendment close in 15 minutes.

The motion was agreed to.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Oklahoma [Mr. NICHOLS] is recognized for 5 minutes.

Mr. NICHOLS. Mr. Chairman, I believe that in the discussion of this amendment we can all reach a common ground. I do not think there is a Member of this body who will say that he wants boys under 18 years of age serving in the National Army in time of war. Since we agree on that, what is this thing we are arguing about? Why, certainly, there are young men in the National Guard under 18 years of age and certainly they got in there upon a misstatement of fact. Who are you that you are going to hold so strictly to an accounting of the truth boys of tender years? Why, children, your kids and mine, little tots, are famous for fabricating stories and we think that is funny. They have to finally reach almost the full dawn of maturity before they reach the point where we punish them severely about telling stories, and many of these youngsters, by the way, are in the National Guard, having given a false age with the consent of their parents in many instances. Now, whom are you going to punish? Are you going to punish the children or the parents? When they came into the National Guard they did not see looming before them in a few years a holocaust of war. They did not see coming a conflict which would involve them in battle and bloodshed.

Mr. MAY. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. NICHOLS. In just a moment.

The National Guard was more or less of a social organization, with drills once every month or once every 2 weeks, with a chance to get into the pretty, new armory, to wear a uniform, and to parade the streets at different times.

Many of them went into the guard because of the dire need of their family which could so easily use the $20 or $30 a quarter that they would receive from their service in the guard.

Others went in largely because of the 2 weeks' vacation they could get on full pay.

For many of these youngsters, who were willing to lie about their age in order to get in, the situation would have been entirely different had they realized that the contract which they were about to enter into would ultimately take them into a bloody war before they had reached the age of accountability. They did not go in there with full knowledge that they were likely to be called into the National Army and sent to war, and we all agree that they should not be. Then what is the matter with this amendment? It simply says that boys under 18 years of age shall be honorably discharged before this law goes into effect insofar as they are concerned.

Why, the only answer to the proposition that the amendment should not be adopted is the fact that it is already the law.

Mr. MAY. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. NICHOLS. I will be very happy to yield to the chairman of the committee.

Mr. MAY. The gentleman understands, of course, that any one of these 18-year-old boys can resign at any time he wants to before he is called and, furthermore, he understands that where a man joins the Regular Army and makes a misrepresentation as to his age, he is always given a blue discharge. And does the gentleman think there ought to be a distinction made between these National Guard men and the Regular Army people?

Mr. NICHOLS. Why, certainly. Right today in Louisiana, there is a great encampment of National Guard taken from my State of Oklahoma and other States in that section, where these boys are now in camp. I am not sure that they will get home in time, I am not sure they will know in time that 16- and 17-year-old kids among them can get out from under this enlistment, which they have entered into, maybe, by misrepresentation, but I am one who does not think that the emergency in this country is such that we need to compel kids under 18 years of age to stay in the National Army.

The gentleman from Kentucky, chairman of the Committee on Military Affairs, points out that youngsters who lie about their age in order to get into the Regular Army, are given a "blue" discharge, and that following that line of reasoning the same thing should apply to these boys in the National Guard. This is one of the very reasons why I am supporting this amendment. I know full well that officers of the National Guard in many instances held out inducements to young men under 18 years of age, which would cause them to enlist in the National Guard, and in nearly every instance boys under 18 who did enlist in a National Guard company, the officers in that company knew that the boy was under age. And now the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. MAY] would be as severe on these youngsters as he would be on men enlisting in the Regular Army. I do not want these young men under 18 years of age to go through life with a blot on their character, which would be placed there if they were compelled to have held over them a "blue" discharge. In the event you do not understand what a "blue" discharge is, it is a discharge from which the word "honorable" has been stricken. An honorable discharge is placed on white paper. So unless this amendment is adopted, whenever, under the National Defense Act, any boy exercised his right of demanding his discharge from the National Guard because he was under 18 years of age, he would have to accept a discharge not honorable. This I am tremendously interested in seeing the youth of this Nation protected against.

This is a good amendment and there is not a man among you who can point out one single evil that it will do, and the only argument that can possibly be made against it is the fact that it is already the law. Well, if it is, you will find many other duplications of law on the statute books of this land. Do not have any fear about duplicating another one.

This is a good amendment, it should be passed and, certainly, if we have any responsibility in this body, it is to protect the youth of this country against war, if possible. The amendment ought to be adopted. [Applause.]

Mr. FADDIS. Mr. Chairman, there is no necessity whatever for this amendment. It is a great to-do about nothing.

The National Defense Act already states that nobody shall be allowed to enlist in the National Guard when they are less than 18 years of age. It is very possible that there are here and there some members of the National Guard who are less than 18 years of age. However, if that is the case, undoubtedly, they falsified their age when they enlisted.

The gentleman from Oklahoma who introduced this amendment made the statement here a moment ago that many of these boys joined the National Guard in order to get some spending money. All right, if that is the case, let us look at the position in which they are placed. They entered the National Guard in order to get some spending money. They took advantage of part of the national defense of the United States, a component of the Army that is maintained for the national defense, in order to get some pocket money. Is that manly, patriotic, or commendable? They then took the place of someone who could have served with honorable intentions. When they did that they falsified as to their age, and they have also been getting money under false pretenses ever since that time.

Mr. MASSINGALE. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FADDIS. I cannot yield. The gentleman asked that they be discharged and given an honorable discharge. An honorable discharge for what? For serving their Nation when their services were needed? No, indeed. For cheating the United States Government out of a certain sum of money, whatever it may be, for falsifying their enlistments, for prostituting the common defense for private gain.

Mr. MAY. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FADDIS. When I complete my statement. The gentleman is asking that treatment be accorded these boys in the National Guard which is one of the components of the Army, that is not accorded to men who enlist in the Regular Army. Right away you are going to differentiate between the men in the Regular Service and the men in the rest of the Army of the United States. This would be manifestly unfair, unjust, and unnecessary. I now yield to the gentleman from Kentucky.

Mr. MAY. The gentleman from Pennsylvania is chairman of the particular subcommittee of the Committee on Military Affairs that has this matter of honorable and dishonorable discharges under its supervision. I ask him if it is not a fact that in 90 percent of the cases where fraudulent enlistments have been obtained, the minors have not only falsified their age to the Army, but they have done this without their parents' consent.

Mr. FADDIS. That is true. Some may say, Why object to this? Simply for this reason. It is prejudicial to the discipline of the military forces.

Mr. NICHOLS rose.

Mr. FADDIS. Oh, the gentleman from Oklahoma may smile, but that is a very important thing. He does not realize the necessity for discipline in the military forces.

Mr. NICHOLS. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FADDIS. I cannot yield. The reason why the members of the committee object to this amendment is that it will tend to destroy the discipline of the Army.

Mr. HARNESS. Is it not a fact that the law already provides for precisely the same thing that this amendment accomplishes?

Mr. FADDIS. Yes; that is true.

Mr. WADSWORTH. Oh, the law does not provide for an honorable discharge.

Mr. FADDIS. No; not for an honorable discharge, but it provides for a discharge. Why award them an honorable discharge from the Army? That is something given a man for faithful, honest, and efficient performance of his duty as an American citizen and as a member of the Army. Why, therefore, should we, because of an hysterical demand, reward these boys who have falsified as to their enlistment and who have obtained money under false pretenses by giving them an honorable discharge? You are asking us to give them something to which they are not entitled and something that should go to a man for honest performance of his duty. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Pennsylvania has expired.

Mr. CASE of South Dakota. Mr. Chairman, it is a little difficult for me to understand why there is such opposition, such resistance, to this amendment if it merely gives effect to the intent of existing law. If all of the officers of the National Guard were as careful in discipline and as courteous in their treatment of recruits as I am sure the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. BULWINKLE] has been, these situations would not arise; but unfortunately they do arise.

An example came to my attention in the past 10 days. A boy from the very best of motives, not because he wanted the money, not because he wanted to join a social club, but because he wanted to serve his country and wanted to go to camp, enlisted. He was not 18 years of age. The enlisting officers knew that he was not 18, but they accepted him and let him come in so that he could go to camp with the boys, and he is in camp today. He signed up and prepared to go without the knowledge of his parents and the matter was taken up with me. I inquired at the National Guard Bureau here and was advised that the boy could be discharged and would be discharged before the guard was mustered into the Federal service. From the argument today it appears that boy would get a blue discharge. I do not think that boy ought to be punished by giving him a blue discharge. If he gave his age as 18, it was done with some officer knowing that he was not 18. He did not go in with any idea of cheating the Government out of any money. He wanted to go to camp; he wanted to serve his country, but he did not have his parents' consent. The matter was not taken up with them. A careful National Guard officer probably would have taken it up with them, but it was not done in this instance. Should the boy get a blue discharge for that?

There is another aspect to this question. By passing this bill, in all probability we are changing what was represented to these boys when they enlisted. Common law does not presume that boys under 18 years of age would know or understand the intricate relationship between their State and Federal oaths even if it were explained to them that Congress might change their duties during their enlistment. Under what was understood by them, at least, we are changing their contract in this bill when we propose to bring them fully into the Federal service.

It seems to me under these circumstances that it is unfair for the United States Government to take these boys, many of whom went into the guard from patriotic motives, under the age of 18, and say to them, "We are going to give you a blue discharge." And yet for the boys that we propose later by the conscription act possibly to bring in, we are not even going to register them unless they are 21. It seems to me the discrimination is against the boys who went into the guard from patriotic motives. Why, by this bill draft those boys under 18 or make them take a blue discharge?

Mr. NICHOLS. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CASE of South Dakota. I yield.

Mr. NICHOLS. I just started to answer the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. FADDIS] and I would like to ask the gentleman if he presumes there was a single one of these boys who enlisted in the National Guard for the purpose of obtaining money under false pretenses, as suggested by the gentleman from Pennsylvania?

Mr. CASE of South Dakota. I do not presume any such thing. I think it is a little unfair to these boys to insist that they be given a blue discharge. They do not want that to follow them. That is a handicap for a man in civilian life. It is a handicap if he wants to go into the Government service. Since it is admitted that the present law contemplates that a man will not be in the National Guard unless he is 18 years old, I cannot see why there is so much objection to this amendment which would give force to that intent.

Mr. MAY. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CASE of South Dakota. I yield.

Mr. MAY. I believe the gentleman narrated a report from some of his constituents about some certain young man who had joined, under the age of 18 years. Do you not think you could solve that matter very easily by writing a letter to that constituent and have him tender his resignation before this act goes into effect?

Mr. CASE of South Dakota. Except that I do not want the boy who sought to serve his country to be thrown out of the Army with a blue discharge when the Government is the one that is changing the contract of service or accepted him knowing that he was not 18.

Mr. ROUTZOHN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CASE of South Dakota. I yield.

Mr. ROUTZOHN. I would like to call attention to the wording of this bill as amended:

That any or all members and units of any or all reserve components of the Army of the United States may be called into national service.

All the members of the National Guard as a reserve component are to be called into Federal service. In view of the situation that there is an exception now of all boys under 18, is it not inconsistent for us to say that all members of the National Guard are to be called in?

Mr. CASE of South Dakota. Yes; in fact, I think the amendment might have been worded so as simply to have exempted from the call those under 18 years of age, which would simply have left these boys at home and would avoid this discharge question.

Mr. WADSWORTH. Does that not mean legal members?

Mr. ROUTZOHN. You do not say "legal members"; you say "all members."

Mr. HINSHAW. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CASE of South Dakota. I yield to the gentleman from California.

Mr. HINSHAW. Does the gentleman know whether a man discharged with a blue discharge can reenlist or not?

Mr. CASE of South Dakota. I do not know; but it would be a severe handicap in many ways, and, in my opinion, would blight and unjustifiably penalize the patriotism that led many of these boys to join the guard. I hope that the amendment will prevail.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

All time has expired on the amendment.

The gentleman from New York [Mr. WADSWORTH] offers an amendment to the amendment offered by the gentleman from Oklahoma [Mr. MASSINGALE], which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. WADSWORTH to the amendment offered by Mr. MASSINGALE: After the word "issued", strike out the words "an honorable" and insert the word "a."

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from New York [Mr. WADSWORTH] to the amendment offered by the gentleman from Oklahoma [Mr. MASSINGALE].

The question was taken; and on a division (demanded by Mr. WADSWORTH) there were ayes 74 and noes 70.

Mr. NICHOLS. Mr. Chairman, I demand tellers.

Tellers were ordered, and the Chair appointed Mr. MASSINGALE and Mr. WADSWORTH to act as tellers.

The Committee again divided; and the tellers reported there were ayes 85 and noes 103.

So the amendment to the amendment was rejected.

The CHAIRMAN. The question recurs on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Oklahoma [Mr. MASSINGALE].

The question was taken; and on a division (demanded by Mr. NICHOLS) there were ayes 98 and noes 58.

So the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. MILLER. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. MILLER: Page 2, line 4, after the word "of", strike out the balance of the paragraph and insert "the continental limits of the United States, its island possessions including the Philippine Islands, the Panama Canal Zone, and Alaska."

Mr. MILLER. Mr. Chairman, it may not be necessary to take the full 5 minutes.

I think every Member of the House knows exactly what is involved in this amendment. It was discussed at great length in the other body and most of us have read that debate. It is practically what was known over there as the Adams amendment. At the outset I want to say that I offer this amendment without any thought of who is in the White House or what his politics may be. It does not matter to me whether Mr. Roosevelt or somebody else is in the White House, I still feel the same, that this is the time that we should lean over backward to keep faith with the American people.

If you go out on the street and ask 10 men what this bill is which we are debating today, 9 out of 10 of them will say it is a bill to provide training for the National Guard. To that limit they are for it. But if you tell them that it provides also authority for the President to send units of the National Guard anywhere in the Western Hemisphere, without further action of Congress, I am sure the same 9 out of 10 would be opposed to the resolution.

Mr. RUTHERFORD. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MILLER. I yield.

Mr. RUTHERFORD. The gentleman's position is that this is a training bill?

Mr. MILLER. Exactly.

Mr. RUTHERFORD. And we should keep it a training bill. If an emergency does arise we will deal with it when it comes.

Mr. MILLER. Yes, exactly; and I would be the last man to come to the Well of the House and propose anything that I thought would tie the hands of the President, particularly in this uncertain time. But I cannot foresee any situation that might arise whereby his hands would be tied through the adoption of this amendment. I cannot think of anything that might arise so speedily that Congress could not assemble and deal with it.

Mr. ANDERSON of Missouri. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MILLER. I yield.

Mr. ANDERSON of Missouri. The gentleman considers this a training bill?

Mr. MILLER. I do.

Mr. ANDERSON of Missouri. Will the gentleman tell me why the minority party is so bitterly opposed to it if it is only a training bill?

Mr. MILLER. I am not aware that the minority are against the bill.

Mr. ANDERSON of Missouri. They are against it to a man.

Mr. MASON. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MILLER. I yield.

Mr. MASON. If it is strictly a training bill the minority party is for it, but they are not for it if it is a bill to send the boys outside the United States.

Mr. O'CONNOR. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MILLER. I cannot yield further on this point.

We are facing momentous issues. It is imperative that Congress keep under its own control, unimpaired, the right to declare war. If this bill is enacted as it now stands it will permit the taking of steps that may lead to war inevitably. For instance, if we allow units of the National Guard to go to some place in South America and they should get into trouble, that trouble consisting of entering into combat with troops from Europe—and that is entirely possible—then Congress will have no alternative but to take the necessary action to send the troops necessary to get those that are in a jam out of the jam. To this extent we have given to the President the right to develop a situation that will make peace impossible.

There is a great deal of sentiment in this country for the so-called Ludlow amendment. I believe that if we enact legislation of this kind turning over to the President regardless of who he is the powers and prerogatives of Congress we are only hastening the day that the American people will insist on the adoption of the Ludlow amendment, and they will take into their own hands the question of whether there shall or shall not be a declaration of war.

Mr. ARENDS. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MILLER. I yield.

Mr. ARENDS. I may say to the gentleman from Connecticut that an amendment similar to his was offered in the committee and it lost by only a comparatively small margin.

Mr. MILLER. I believe wholeheartedly that this amendment should be adopted. I do not believe anyone disagrees with me in the statement that the training program is very important. It is so important and so essential that I will vote for the bill even without this amendment, but I hope it will be adopted.

Mr. WOLVERTON of New Jersey. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MILLER. I yield.

Mr. WOLVERTON of New Jersey. According to the public prints the President has said that it is a 100-to-1 shot that the boys would not be sent outside of the continental United States. If this be true, what harm can there be in writing the gentleman's amendment into the bill?

Mr. MILLER. It cannot do any harm, and I do not want any President laying odds on the lives of American citizens.

Mr. WOODRUFF of Michigan. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MILLER. I yield.

Mr. WOODRUFF of Michigan. Is it not true that we have been given to understand that the purpose of this bill is to afford the military authorities an opportunity properly to train the National Guard?

Mr. MILLER. I understand that is the purpose of the bill.

Mr. WOODRUFF of Michigan. Then it certainly is not necessary to send the National Guard to South and Central America where we have no right to send our armed forces.

[Here the gavel fell.]

Mr. EDMISTON. Mr. Chairman, I rise in opposition to the amendment.

Mr. MAY. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. EDMISTON. I yield.

Mr. MAY. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that all debate on this amendment close in 10 minutes.

Mr. MILLS of Louisiana. Mr. Chairman, I object.

Mr. MAY. We cannot all have time.

Mr. RUTHERFORD. Why not? We have all day tomorrow.

Mr. MAY. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that all debate on this amendment close in 20 minutes.

Mr. SCHAFER of Wisconsin. Mr. Chairman, I object.

Mr. MAY. Mr. Chairman, I move that all debate on this amendment close in 20 minutes.

The motion was rejected.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from West Virginia is recognized for 5 minutes.

Mr. EDMISTON. Mr. Chairman, I rise in opposition to the proposed amendment, which merely takes out the words "the Western Hemisphere" and limits the services of the National Guard to the continental United States and certain of our insular possessions.

I do not believe an emergency will arise—I certainly hope it will not—which will make it necessary to send our National Guard beyond the limits of continental United States. But if you will recall when Pershing in his Mexican campaign went into Mexico in 1916 the thing that bogged down that expeditionary force was that, although we had our National Guard along the Mexican border, we could not send them into Mexico even to guard the communication lines of the Regulars under Pershing, who were outside the continental United States; and when Pershing got where he was going, just because the National Guard could not be used to guard his communication lines, he did not have a corporal's guard to work with.

Mr. ANDERSON of Missouri. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. EDMISTON. I yield for a question.

Mr. ANDERSON of Missouri. The same thing would apply to the narrow strip of the Canal Zone, would it not?

Mr. EDMISTON. I do not know whether the amendment includes the Panama Canal Zone or not.

Mr. ANDERSON of Missouri. They would have to stay in the Panama Canal Zone proper.

Mr. EDMISTON. Within a 20-mile zone. If we had a National Guard unit down there guarding the Panama Canal under this amendment they could not go beyond that 20-mile strip of treaty grant where the Canal is located. Certainly to guard the Canal you would necessarily have to have troops farther than 10 miles on each side.

Mr. LUTHER A. JOHNSON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. EDMISTON. I yield to the gentleman from Texas.

Mr. LUTHER A. JOHNSON. Would not the adoption of this amendment be a repudiation by this House of the Monroe Doctrine?

Mr. EDMISTON. It certainly would. If we are going to enforce the Monroe Doctrine we have to do it in the Western Hemisphere. We have to allow some discretion and some judgment to the Commander in Chief of our Army and Navy in the event of an emergency. I do not think the Commander in Chief of our Army is going to send the National Guard out of continental United States unless he feels that an emergency exists and when it does exist the National Guard should be sent out of the continental United States.

Mr. HINSHAW. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. EDMISTON. I yield to the gentleman from California.

Mr. HINSHAW. Is it not the gentleman's conception of this bill that it is a bill for the purpose of training the National Guard, or is it a bill for policing the Western Hemisphere?

Mr. EDMISTON. I think the bill at the present time is for training the National Guard, but most certainly with the thought that we may have to police the Western Hemisphere.

Mr. HINSHAW. Cannot Congress act in that event and order the guard anywhere in the world, if necessary?

Mr. EDMISTON. The Congress can act; yes. That is what I think should be done now.

Mr. THORKELSON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. EDMISTON. I yield to the gentleman from Montana.

Mr. THORKELSON. Is it not a fact that in case war is declared or the necessity occurs that may lead us to war, the President then is automatically given the power to call the National Guard?

Mr. EDMISTON. By the Congress.

Mr. THORKELSON. This act is simply to train the guard and it should be done in the United States and our possessions.

Mr. EDMISTON. That is all right, but when the emergency arises why not be able to act? We will give it to him if the time arrives. Why not now?

Mr. THORKELSON. In case of war, in case war is threatened, then he actually has the power to send the National Guard or any other guard out. There is no necessity for this in time of peace. The guard is to be trained in the United States, not in Brazil, in Uruguay, in Paraguay, in Argentina, in Brazil, Peru, or any of the South American republics.

Mr. EDMISTON. But if we have to send them into Mexico, I do not think it should require an act of Congress to do so.

Mr. THORKELSON. We are at peace with Mexico. Why should we assume that we are in a state of war with Mexico now?

Mr. EDMISTON. I am not, but we should be able to send the National Guard down there without an act of Congress.

Mr. FERGUSON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. EDMISTON. I yield to the gentleman from Oklahoma.

Mr. FERGUSON. General Marshall in his testimony said, "They are in the Army of the United States." Can the gentleman visualize an Army in which one man may be sent one place and the man next to him would have to be left at home?

Mr. EDMISTON. They are in the Army of the United States and under the national-defense plan they will not be the home guard. They are in the Army now.

[Here the gavel fell.]

Mr. REED of New York. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word.

Mr. Chairman, just to keep the record straight and so that we may know just about where we are going, I shall go back just a little bit to an earlier experience.

At New York, on January 27, 1916, Woodrow Wilson said:

> Under the Constitution only upon occasion of actual invasion has the President of the United States the right to ask these men (members of the National Guard) to leave their respective States.

But this is what was written into the conscription bill:

> The President is hereby authorized to draft into the military service of the United States, organize and officer, any and all members of the National Guard and of the National Guard Reserves, and said members so drafted into the military service of the United States shall serve therein for the existing emergency.

The law was passed in that form. The President immediately by proclamation drafted the National Guard in its entirety, and within a few weeks various units thereof were on their way, under compulsion, to France.

Mr. ANDREWS. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. REED of New York. I yield to the gentleman from New York.

Mr. ANDREWS. The gentleman is incorrect in one particular. As a part of the National Guard they had a right to refuse to take the oath.

Mr. REED of New York. That has nothing to do with the matter at all, so far as the ultimate purpose for which the National Guard was used.

Mr. MILLS of Louisiana. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last two words.

Mr. Chairman, I am particularly interested in the subject I have in mind and I desire every Member of the House to pay close attention to what I have to say.

We have in this country approximately 15,000,000 colored people and I understand certain colored boys down home have been undertaking to join the Army. Do you know what they have been telling those colored boys? "We do not have any camps." So I say to the House, I believe it is unfair for the Army to enlist the white boys, the best blood of America, and put them in these Army camps and train them, and then in case of a war, which I hope we are not going to have—and for my part we are not going to have—take the white boys of America and send them out on the battlefields and let those boys be killed while the colored boys remain at home, and then come along here about 6 months, or 8 months, or a year, or a year and a half later and undertake to train the colored boys. Why not now construct some Army camps for the colored boys and permit them to come into the Army if you propose to force the white man into service. I would appreciate it if the Committee on Military Affairs would give some attention to this thought. [Applause.]

Mr. FADDIS. Mr. Chairman, I rise in opposition to the amendment.

Mr. Chairman, I first want to assure the gentleman from Louisiana who just preceded me that the situation to which he referred is being corrected. Only this morning on the radio the announcement was made that they were soliciting the enlistment of colored men in the Army. The General Staff is getting ready as rapidly as possible to form camps to take care of them.

Mr. MILLS of Louisiana. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FADDIS. I am sorry, I cannot yield.

This amendment to limit the use of the National Guard to the continental United States and its possessions is a mistake, and I hope the members of this committee will not support the amendment. With the state of the world what it is today, no man can say with any degree of certainty what may happen tomorrow. Anyone who has been watching affairs overseas certainly should recognize that today time is the essence of any movement to protect the integrity of this or any other nation.

We are committed to a policy of protection of the Monroe Doctrine. The protection of the Monroe Doctrine means that we shall not allow any European nation to acquire any more territory in this hemisphere or shall not allow any change in territory from the hands of one European nation to those of another. That is a part of our foreign policy upon which both parties agree. It is the part of our national policy that the General Staff of the United States Army has time and time again advised the Congress is most essential. They have time and time again advised the Committee on Millitary Affairs of the House of Representatives that if it is necessary to make any moves in this hemisphere to uphold the Monroe Doctrine it will in all probability be necessary to make such moves very swiftly.

The gentleman from West Virginia [Mr. EDMISTON] stated one of the best examples you can imagine in relation to the use of the National Guard. I want to repeat it, and I do hope the Committee will take it into consideration. In 1916, when the punitive expedition was sent into Mexico, before General Pershing reached his objective it was necessary for him in order to guard his lines to drop out detachments all along the line. When he reached his objective his force was insufficient to accomplish any important mission. The merits of the Pershing expedition have nothing to do with the case, but the fact that it was necessary to so dissipate his forces that he could accomplish nothing is the real gist of the matter.

If it is necessary because of conditions for us at this time to send any of our Regular Establishment into any part of this hemisphere in order to protect it from seizure by any European power, it may be necessary for us to use some part of the National Guard in connection with that force. We have certain components in the National Guard that are necessary to the functioning of the Regular forces. Part of the Army of the United States is the National Guard, and certain components of the National Guard cannot be duplicated in the Regular forces. Therefore, today, if it were necessary to make a sudden move in order to uphold the Monroe Doctrine, it might be necessary to use some part of the National Guard in order to assist in the move.

I do hope the Committee will give serious consideration to this amendment and not allow a hysterical sentiment to sweep it into something it will later regret. The world is in a state of turmoil. No man can guarantee to you what move may be necessary tomorrow. But we do want to place this Nation in such a position that if any move is necessary we can move swiftly to protect our interests, whatever they may be. It is necessary that in this piece of legislation authority be granted to use the National Guard any place in the Western Hemisphere.

Mr. LUTHER A. JOHNSON. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FADDIS. I yield to the gentleman from Texas.

Mr. LUTHER A. JOHNSON. Would not the adoption of this amendment be a discouragement to the South American countries in their cooperation with us in the defense of the Monroe Doctrine?

Mr. FADDIS. Absolutely. Not very long ago I was in Central America, and one of the points on the mind of the people in that country was what position we would take in case of invasion there. Also the adoption of this amendment will be aid, comfort, and encouragement to any of the totalitarian powers either in the east or west. If we are to quibble or play politics over such matters, we are setting our feet in the same road which France trod. That road leads to national impotence and to destruction. [Applause.]

Mr. MARTIN of Iowa. Mr. Chairman, I rise in support of the amendment. This is the amendment I spoke about this morning during the general debate. I am very happy to know that the gentleman from Connecticut [Mr. MILLER] is supporting this amendment and has seen fit to introduce it. I introduced the amendment in the committee, and I did not get very far. The committee did not entertain any debate on the amendment whatever. The total time given to my offer in the committee was less than 1 minute.

I have been somewhat impressed by the debate in the Senate on this subject, as I consider the provision this amendment seeks to change the most controversial provision in the entire bill.

I am in favor of the bill, but I am not in favor of leaving the Western Hemisphere provision in the measure as the bill is now written. This same amendment, as you may recall, was voted on in the Senate after rather extended debate and defeated by the close margin of 39 to 38. I gave you the citations in my previous discussion and showed that Congress clearly has the power to restrict, but now is the time you have got to do it. You pass this bill and then try to restrict the President's power and see how far you will get. There has not been sufficient emergency shown, in my judgment, to establish the need for such a broad power to be exercised by the President as the power to send the National Guard to any point in the Western Hemisphere he may choose. Your National Defense Act requires a congressionally declared emergency before the President can order out the guard, but you order out the guard by this act and examine your National Defense Act and see whether it takes a congressionally declared emergency for the President to send them into a foreign land. The same authorities I cited you this morning hold very strongly that once the National Guard is ordered to duty in the Army of the United States the President has almost unlimited powers as to where he may send them unless you restrict it in the authority that you are granting.

Now, what is the emergency, if any, today? It is an emergency calling for training, and if we order out the guard for training purposes we can then examine any development of a further emergency in relatively short order. The thing you cannot get in short order is adequate training. You can get the authority to send them abroad very quickly on a proper showing of an emergency, but the factor on which we cannot shorten the time is the time required for training.

Let us take this bill as amended by this amendment, get our training, and then let us look into the emergency that requires the authority to send them abroad. If you examine the authorities I have cited, you will find that now is your time to limit the Executive in the matter of where he may send them.

Mr. CASE of South Dakota. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MARTIN of Iowa. In just a second I will yield.

The President has made the statement that the chance would be about 100 to 1 against sending them abroad. I am not willing to gamble 1 to 100 that he will not. [Applause.]

I now yield to the gentleman from South Dakota.

Mr. CASE of South Dakota. Some reference has been made to our experience in 1916 when Pershing went into Mexico. Does the gentleman remember the size of the Regular Army at that time as compared with the present authorized strength of the Army?

Mr. MARTIN of Iowa. I am very pleased that the gentleman has brought out that point. I cannot give you the exact answer but the Regular Army is very much larger today of course. I can tell you my experience in connection with the Mexican campaign referred to. I was in the last unit that took part in the Mexican campaign and saw service on the Mexican border. I served there nearly 3 years. I had ample opportunity to see what had been accomplished in Mexico and I have my own judgment as to whether that expedition was worth while or not. That was a very real experience I had that I can look back to, and 3 years is a long time to spend in that type of service.

Mr. WOLVERTON of New Jersey. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MARTIN of Iowa. I yield to the gentleman from New Jersey.

Mr. WOLVERTON of New Jersey. The illustration has been given by the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. FADDIS] to which the gentleman has just referred as a reason why this provision should remain in the bill. Was there any evidence produced before the gentleman's committee that indicated any unfriendliness on the part of Mexico or on the part of any other South American or Central American ccuntry that would make such a provision necessary at this time?

Mr. MARTIN of Iowa. There was nothing brought to my attention to justify getting panicky about sending anybody down there before Congress would have a chance to examine the situation. [Applause.]

Mr. SMITH of Connecticut. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word.

Mr. Chairman, I rise in opposition to the amendment offered by my colleague, the gentleman from Connecticut [Mr. MILLER], because I feel that the language in the bill is necessary to the proper preparation of the defense of this country. I say that not as a military expert, because I am not a military expert, but I say it because the evidence of the officers of the staff who appeared before us and the testimony they have given convince me that we need this authority for them properly to plan and prepare the protection not only of the Monroe Doctrine, but of the Panama Canal and of continental United States.

They have not sufficient units of some types in the Regular Army for any kind of action by all of the Regular Army, particularly antiaircraft and harbor defense troops. If Britain should be overrun and there was danger of a seizure of bases on this side of the ocean, within reach of continental United States by air or within reach of the Canal itself by air, it would be necessary for us to take over some of the islands in this hemisphere which do not belong to us.

We do not have a sufficient regular force of all arms available and on hand at the present time to do that. The National Guard is formed into units. It is largely trained. It needs more men and more training, but in order to have what the Staff considers a sufficient force to secure our own safety here this authority is necessary. It may be necessary in a situation like that to move rapidly, and I don't think there is any prospect of use in the far parts of South America of any force, but I do know that it may be necessary to prevent the establishment of bases in Bermuda, say, in the Windward Islands, places which, if bases of an enemy were once established, it would be very difficult and costly to dislodge, and they would endanger the safety of the Canal, which is our life line, and would endanger continental United States. It is not a probability, but we have to take into consideration any possibility of disaster in a military way to those countries which now have bases, which are potential threats to our own safety, and I believe that this thing is necessary to properly plan and prepare our own defense. This bill is for training of the guard. That is true. It is also a part of the program for the preparation of a sufficient force to defend this country.

Mr. MILLER Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SMITH of Connecticut. I yield.

Mr. MILLER. Does not my colleague feel that the Regular Army of two-hundred-and-sixty-thousand-odd has the duty to take such action as we need in Bermuda, such as the gentleman has suggested, and that this guard should be permitted to stay at home and train?

Mr. SMITH of Connecticut. I don't think they have the force necessary to do it in the Regular Army alone. It will take a long time to expand the Regular Army, if that is the method you choose to take. This is a method which is available to us, a force actually in existence, which in a very short time could be made available, and time has become one of the most important factors, as has been illustrated by the events in the last 9 months in Europe. This force is available in a much shorter time than we can expand and equip another force.

Mr. THORKELSON. Would it not be an act of war for us to occupy Bermuda or any British possession at the present time?

Mr. SMITH of Connecticut. With Great Britain?

Mr. THORKELSON. Yes.

Mr. SMITH of Connecticut. If it is necessary it would have to be done in order to protect ourselves, whether there is a declaration of war or not. We cannot allow the occupation of bases by an unfriendly power that are within easy reach of this country.

Mr. THORKELSON. But it would be an act of war with Great Britain?

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Connecticut has expired.

Mr. HINSHAW. Mr. Chairman, I think the cat is pretty well out of the bag. This bill has been "hopped up" as a National Guard training bill, but it is quite evident it is exactly what it says, and that is to strengthen the national defense. There is no use trying to hide this any further. Let us not kid ourselves any about this being a National Guard training bill. It is a bill for the strengthening of the national defense by calling out the National Guard and the Reserves, and for arming and sending the National Guard, the Reserves, and the Regular Army troops into any part of the Western Hemisphere as occasion may be deemed to warrant without further authority. I remind you that sometime ago two resolutions were introduced in the House. One was House Joint Resolution 555 and the other was House Joint Resolution 556. They were side by side—House Joint Resolutions 555 and 556. House Joint Resolution 556, as I remember it, was a bill which we passed a while ago reasserting, as some say, the Monroe Doctrine. House Joint Resolution 555, alongside of it, was this bill in its original form, except that the bill now before us has a Senate number. At that time, when House Joint Resolution 556 was under consideration, I voted "yea" upon it, but then I considered its probable connection with House Joint Resolution 555, and withdrew my vote and voted "present." I think the question is quite clear. If we adopt the amendment of the gentleman from Connecticut [Mr. MILLER] we are in favor of training the National Guard and the Reserves. If we leave the bill as it is, we are in favor of allowing the President to order the National Guard to go anywhere in the Western Hemisphere for any purpose, regardless of what the Congress and the people of the United States may then think about it. I yield back the remainder of my time.

Mr. THOMASON. Mr. Chairman, I shall take the few minutes allotted to me to appeal to your patriotism and your calm, deliberate, and dispassionate judgment. I hope if you have any partisan or political inclinations you will divest yourselves of them because this is a big question, and I recall to your mind the resolution that was passed in this House about 6 weeks ago, to which the gentleman from California [Mr. HINSHAW] has just referred. As I recall, it was passed by a unanimous vote and, I believe, without a roll call, reasserting our confidence and belief in the Monroe Doctrine and our determination to uphold and protect it.

I will refresh your memories about another thing. About a year or 18 months ago our friends on the minority, headed by the distinguished gentleman from New York [Mr. WADSWORTH] and the distinguished gentleman from New York [Mr. ANDREWS] and others, also brought in the policy of the minority regarding national defense, in which they asserted in unequivocal terms the determination of their party and of this Congress to defend the Monroe Doctrine.

May I refresh your memory a little further? Only 2 weeks ago the great Secretary of State, Mr. Hull, went to Habana, where he entered into an agreement with the South American republics in which they were promised and assured that by cooperating with us we would cooperate with them in the defense of the Western Hemisphere. It was the good-neighbor policy in action. That resolution to which I first referred also carries with it the solemn promise that if any foreign power undertakes to transfer any of their possessions in the Western Hemisphere to another foreign power, it would be regarded as a violation of the Monroe Doctrine.

Now, just to be frank about it, what will our friends in South America, with whom we are cultivating cordial relations, think about it if this amendment is adopted? If we are to save ourselves, we are going to need them and they are going to need us. What do you think they will have to say about our good faith when we give them these promises, and the first time a measure comes up which says that when our troops go to Panama and some catastrophe happens down there just out of the Canal Zone our Federal troops, our Regular Army, can cross that little narrow 10-mile strip to fight for our rights, but that the men who are in the National Guard cannot do it? That kind of a situation would be ridiculous.

I say it is the most inconsistent foreign policy this Congress can assume. We are going to rise or fall with the Western Hemisphere. [Applause.] They are the only friends we have left. Ours is the last great democracy in the world. The South American republics have time and again manifested a determined desire to be friendly and cooperate with us. God knows if the situation going on this very minute in England should mean the fall of the British Empire, and especially the taking over of the British Navy, then it certainly seems to me that we need the friendship and cooperation of the South American republics. We cannot blow hot and cold. We must prove our faith and promises by our works. Yes; it is a tremendous question. This is a very solemn hour, as I regard it, in the history of this Congress and of this Nation. This is something that so far transcends politics and partisanship that it ought not even be discussed. [Applause.] This is no time to register your hatred of the President of the United States. Our task and duty is to save America and to preserve for all time the American way of life.

I may be such a believer in the sincerity and even in the greatness and patriotism of the gentleman from New York [Mr. WADSWORTH], whom I have heard discuss this matter on several occasions, that I think it is high time to be Americans rather than to be Democrats and Republicans. [Applause.] My appeal is to the best and the finest in you.

My appeal to my colleagues, regardless of party, is that in this tragic hour, in this hour when perhaps America faces the greatest crisis in all of its glorious history, that we forget matters of partisanship and think about the principles upon which this Government was founded and upon which it has lived and prospered for these 150 years. [Applause.] Liberty is worth fighting and dying for. Read the headlines in any newspaper and see what is happening in England. Then ask yourself this question, Can that happen in America?

I hope the amendment is voted down. [Applause.]

[Here the gavel fell.]

Mr. MAY. Mr. Chairman, it is evident to me that since the Committee voted not to limit debate on this amendment this bill cannot be finished this afternoon. In view of that fact, I wish to make this announcement—that I am going to move that the Committee do rise, and I want to serve notice that if there is not a quorum here tomorrow morning there will be a roll call.

Mr. Chairman, I move that the Committee do now rise.

The question was taken; and on a division (demanded by Mr. MAY) there were ayes 120 and noes 96.

So the motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the Committee rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. WOODRUM of Virginia, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, reported that that Committee had had under consideration Senate Joint Resolution 286, and directed him to report that it had come to no resolution thereon.

MILK DISTRIBUTION IN THE DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA

Mr. GROSS. Mr. Speaker, in order to keep the records straight and to give the House the facts concerning the distribution of relief milk commonly known as 5-cent milk in the District of Columbia, I want to correct certain erroneous statements made by the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. SCHULTE] recently. During the milk controversy last winter before the District Committee and on the floor of this House I said that the way to give the District cheap milk was to quit talking about it and give it to them. At last after all these months they are getting it. And now the gentleman is not satisfied; calls it a monstrosity; talks of the oppressed people in the District. I would like him to explain to the Members in the House who is being oppressed.

I did not know that oppression was tolerated in this country. He finds fault with the fact that the stations are only open 4 hours a day. I want to call your attention to the fact that these people getting this milk are unemployed; they have nothing to do and they can come and get this milk at any time. He is finding fault about the quantity given. He made the slanderous remark that the members of the Maryland-Virginia Milk Producers Association should be ashamed of themselves picking on innocent mothers and children who cannot protect themselves, as he says. He criticizes the quantity of milk given to an individual. Now the facts are that the Maryland-Virginia Milk Producers Association is one of the best organized and soundest farm cooperatives in America, under leadership that commands the respect of all those who believe in farm organizations and who have been recognized from coast to coast for the services that they have rendered to their organization as well as to the consuming public.

Mr. SCHAFER of Wisconsin. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GROSS. I have not the time to yield.

Mr. SCHAFER of Wisconsin. Mr. Speaker, I make the point of order a quorum is not present.

Mr. GROSS. Mr. Speaker, I yield to the gentleman.

Mr. SCHAFER of Wisconsin. Mr. Speaker, I withdraw the point of order. Does the gentleman approve of the milk monopoly in the District of Columbia, the Nation's Capital, charging the consumers 12 cents a quart for buttermilk and 14 cents a quart for milk?

Mr. GROSS. I am not discussing that issue.

This organization has long served this municipality with a quality of milk unsurpassed in any other market in the country. He contends that he was sufficiently interested to drive out on the farms and ask certain producers what they do with their surplus milk and that certain farmers told him that they must have some for their pigs. He maliciously stated on the floor of this House that these farmers are giving their pigs consideration before they give the consumers of Washington any milk. Certainly that is going to be resented by every producer in the organization as well as by every other farmer who makes milk or raises pigs. There has been no shortage of milk in the District of Columbia. These farmers have always seen to this and if after supplying the needs of this city they use any other milk they may have to feed their pigs is no one's affair except the farmers', and I am quite sure that the farmers in Indiana have saved millions of pigs by giving them milk at critical times and thus were able to pay off their farm mortgages with the sale of their hogs.

Mr. DITTER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GROSS. I yield to the gentleman from Pennsylvania.

Mr. DITTER. Mr. Speaker, it seems to me it is in order at this time to compliment the gentleman for the splendid way in which he is approaching this problem here in the District, and I want to take this opportunity to commend him not only for his work in connection with the needs of the District but for the splendid work he is doing as a Member of the House. [Applause.]

Mr. GROSS. I thank the gentleman.

Mr. Speaker, there was a time when the Department of Agriculture gave me wide publicity as a hog grower and my success was made possible by the fact that we fed the pigs milk, and I make no apologies to the gentleman from Indiana or anyone else for the fact that we fed these pigs milk. I want to assure the gentleman the pigs get no milk that can be sold at 20 cents per gallon. The pigs are only getting the milk that the market cannot absorb.

So far as the distribution in the city is concerned 11 stations have been opened. These have been authorized by the Department of Welfare and are under their regulation. The dairy supplying this milk puts a man in each one of these stands during the hours when they are open to make the collections. An unlimited amount of milk is available. On the opening day there were cards out which had been issued by the Department of Public Assistance for a total of 1,976 quarts. Not nearly all of that milk was taken away; only 1,171 quarts. If these people that the gentleman from Indiana pities so much are too lazy and indifferent to go to the station and get the milk then they are not entitled to it. However, I think after the system is more generally understood there will be very few who will not avail themselves of that privilege. The gentleman from Indiana seems to be greatly annoyed because a certain milk company in the city is supplying this milk. May I say for his information that bids were given out for this milk and the company that is supplying it is the successful bidder. It is an entirely legitimate transaction and he cannot point a finger of scorn at anyone. It is true the successful bidder was not the company the gentleman represents. He weeps about the quantity that an individual may receive. For your information may I say that that quantity has been arrived at by the dairy section of the three A's based on experience of a few years and has been limited to these amounts because too many of the people on relief that got this milk would resell it. We had that experience in my home market in Pennsylvania. When we gave the reliefers milk they sold it for money to buy gasoline and in some cases for money to buy beer. And while these quantities of milk may not seem large they are sufficient and in most cases more than the same individuals would use if they had to purchase the milk on the market. This quantity was further approved by the home-economics section of the A. A. A. This milk is made possible because the farmers who produce it are willing to take 5 cents per quart instead of 7½ as they get for their basic quantity. The Surplus Commodities Corporation is paying the 2.7 cents per quart to the dealer for handling the milk. I am wondering why the gentleman from Indiana is so much interested in selling the cream of the Sunshine Creamery Co. of Indiana in the District of Columbia when it is a farm-separated product made in many cases without any restrictions or sanitary regulations whatever. I can assure him if the District of Columbia is getting milk from Pennsylvania it is made under sanitary regulations. I am wondering what he has done in Indiana to get cheap milk for the poor people? I am wondering if the milk given away in Washington, D. C., at 5 cents a quart came from Indiana, would he be perfectly at ease?

I have a few other questions in mind that I would like to be straightened out on and finally I guess I will have to go for my information to the crystal gazers here in the District of Columbia.

Mr. SCHAFER of Wisconsin. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GROSS. I yield.

Mr. SCHAFER of Wisconsin. Under the law, Pennsylvania milk is not allowed to come into the District by reason of the stranglehold of the milk trust. Get your facts straight. Do not tell us about Pennsylvania milk coming in here legally. Pennsylvania milk should come in here, Wisconsin milk should come in, Indiana milk should come in. We have just as good milk, and better milk in Wisconsin than they have in Pennsylvania, Virginia, and Maryland.

The SPEAKER. Under a previous special order, the gentleman from New York [Mr. EDWIN A. HALL] is recognized for 2 minutes.

Mr. EDWIN A. HALL. Mr. Speaker, I have just returned from a trip back home and have brought with me a startling editorial written by the distinguished editor of the Binghamton Press, Mr. Tom R. Hutton. At the outset of my remarks, I would like to call your attention to the fact that this newspaper has a tremendous circulation throughout my congressional district and is looked upon by the folks back home as a crusader in moral and political questions affecting my locality.

It might be well to mention also that Editor Hutton is a former Washington newspaper correspondent and enjoys a wide acquaintance here. It is not just coincidental that for the past 10 years the Binghamton Press has prognosticated most correctly many major political campaigns and events.

The fact is, the man responsible for this keen analysis of the political scene is none other than Mr. Hutton himself.

Lest there are those who will take issue with this editorial disclosure that I am about to read, on the grounds that this newspaper is playing partisan politics, I will also state that in 1932 President Roosevelt had no firmer supporter during his campaign than this influential newspaper. So that when charges such as this editorial makes are brought out in the open it is a sure thing that both the editor and his paper have proof that such activities against the best interests of true American government are to take place. For this reason, and also because such a substantial force for social good in my community is vitally interested, I believe that it is my duty to bring this matter before the House at this time.

Therefore, Mr. Speaker, I ask the closest attention from my colleagues while I read Mr. Hutton's most interesting editorial:

SOMETHING LIKE A PATTERN

The price of a vote in the forthcoming Presidential election will be new and high. From the early August road, it would appear that the price will be the highest ever paid for a vote in any American Presidential election.

And that price, apparently, is to be individual immunity of the faithful from armed service in defense of and for the security of America.

The thing which was at first nebulous and seemed quite fantastic is now becoming obvious. That huge army of jobless Americans and children of jobless Americans represented by W. P. A., N. Y. A., C. C. C., and the host of politically faithful henchmen, administrators, executives, and subexecutives who comprise the official framework of those alphabetical agencies, is to be insured and in part assured in advance that most of it will not be called into the armed forces of the United States, draft or no draft.

A deliberate, carefully planned and purposeful program has been laid out, the real objective of which is to put as many of the enrolled personnel of the alphabetical agencies into categories where they may be reasonably certified as being essential to national defense, and so not liable to draft, for armed service as soldiers.

Of this general plan, the enrollment of W. P. A. in the vocational defense training courses is the most obvious, and the beginning.

Otherwise, why all the heat on the part of the political W. P. A. bosses? Otherwise, why the furious and almost frantic resentment at the disclosure of the tail-twisting processes they have exerted on the State educational department?

Otherwise, why give preference in the vocational courses to unemployed and unskilled jobless, over employed men with trades?

Certainly nothing of the sort would be done if the only purpose were to turn out the greatest number of most efficient craftsmen in national-defense industry within the shortest possible time.

If that were the objective, then men who already have basic knowledge of the trades and skills would be given the preference—as they should be—because obviously they could be prepared not only most quickly but most efficiently for the best and most efficient immediate service to industry in national defense.

No, that isn't the objective. The objective is to put as many of the less efficient, less ambitious, jobless, into categories where they may be so certified as essential to noncombatant activity at W. P. A. wages plus, instead of having to carry a gun at $21 or $30 a month, and learn military discipline.

Naturally there is going to be some gratitude on the part of some of the appointed hundreds of thousands, and even the millions who, under this plan, and the extension of this plan, will be exempt from active military service. Naturally they are going to be inclined to vote for the administration which is going out of its way to see that they are safe from conscription.

And what parents of voting age will be ungrateful enough to vote against the administration which is just about ready to put the boys of N. Y. A. into the same category of exemption through "training in mechanical and other lines" which will make them "essential to national defense"?

The advisers of Mr. Roosevelt have not forgotten the wave of practical political gratitude from the mothers and fathers of this country who reelected Woodrow Wilson because "he kept us out of war," meaning that he kept their boys out of war—just 3 months before those boys were no longer safe for democracy or anything else.

Already the moves in this direction are becoming apparent. N. Y. A. will be the next of the faithful alphabetical agencies to be put into industrial training essential to national defense and so, for the large part, taken out of possible call for military service.

It is no secret that there is already fabricated and ready in Washington a similar plan for C. C. C. This includes the training of C. C. C. boys in motor maintenance and other activities of the sort, which will automatically eliminate them from the active service provisions of whatever military conscription bill may be passed, and give them right of line in an ever-expanding Government defense pay roll and private pay rolls controlled by Government contract awards.

Nobody has given the go-ahead on that C. C. C. plan so far. The administration is feeling its way in this amazing scheme of insuring the votes of millions through the process of sheer human gratitude at being saved from military service.

There simply isn't any sense in getting hot and bothered about it. This is what is going to happen and already is happening with plan and objective now clearly defined, no matter how many denials there may be.

We suspect that the denials will be sharp and thunderous, because nobody likes to be caught at such a trick. Nobody likes to be successfully accused of playing politics with the very safety of the Nation. Even totalitarian politicos realize that there might be more Americans who would resent such a plan than there might be Americans who would appreciate it and vote "right" out of gratitude.

So vehement, unqualified, and blistering denials plus some shrill abuse are in order.

Yet this prophecy stands. Paste it in your hat or on the kitchen wall and watch it develop to realization. Whatever compulsory military training bill is passed will probably contain provisions coordinated to the almost atrocious ultimate political objective of this daring raid on American confidence and American traditions.

Mr. McKEOUGH. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for 3 minutes.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. McKEOUGH]?

There was no objection.

Mr. McKEOUGH. Mr. Speaker, I direct attention to the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD of August 7, pages 10037 and 10038, from which you will note the colloquy between the gentleman from Connecticut [Mr. MILLER] and myself. I spoke to the gentleman from Connecticut a few minutes ago and indicated to him that I was going to make some reference to that exchange of views, but he stated he would be unable to remain at the present time and would make such comment later as might be provoked by what I had to say.

On Tuesday of this week the gentleman from Connecticut [Mr. MILLER] called attention to a delay of 11 days in the President's office or in the White House on some 14 Navy contracts with relation to national-defense items. I seriously questioned the correctness of that statement on the premise that obviously the President, as the Commander in Chief of the Army and the Navy of the Nation, would not be guilty of unusual delay with reference to the execution of any contract that had to do with the production of the necessary devices for proper defense of the Nation; but in order to develop the correctness of the situation I contacted Mr. McReynolds, who is an assistant secretary at the White House, now acting as secretary of the Advisory Commission to the Council of National Defense, and directed his attention to the exchange of views between the gentleman from Connecticut [Mr. MILLER] and myself o nthose 2 pages, 10037 and 10038, and asked that he have a very careful check made for the purpose of establishing whether or not there was any justification for the observation made by the gentleman from Connecticut.

Under date of August 12 Mr. McReynolds addressed a letter to me, and in it he has the following to say:

THE ADVISORY COMMISSION TO THE COUNCIL OF NATIONAL DEFENSE,
Washington, D. C., August 12, 1940.

Hon. RAYMOND S. McKEOUGH,
House of Representatives.

MY DEAR MR. McKEOUGH: Pursuant to your telephone call and after examination of the CONGRESSIONAL RECOORD of August 8, I have had further careful inquiry made as to the possible congestion of contracts at the White House. I find no such congestion existed on July 12, or at any other time, and that the report that certain Navy contracts were delayed awaiting Presidential approval is entirely without foundation.

Sincerely,

WM. H. McREYNOLDS, Secretary.

Mr. Speaker, I showed that letter to Mr. Miller, who, I am sure, would not in any way desire to offer criticism without justification in fact, but he still feels he was justified in making the assertion that appears on the pages referred to in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD previously mentioned and indicated to me in conversation this afternoon that he will submit for the benefit of the House sufficient evidence to justify his statement.

My only purpose in having a search made was to establish for the benefit of the Congress and the country that Congress being asked to proceed with a haste that is consonant with good judgment to bring about the enactment of the necessary legislation with which to protect the security of the Nation, would not want it to develop that any contracts executed by either the Navy or the War Department with that objective in view might be unnecessarily delayed by the administrative department of the Government, whether it be the White House or elsewhere.

[Here the gavel fell.]

Mr. McKEOUGH. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for 2 additional minutes.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Illinois?

There was no objection.

Mr. McKEOUGH. Mr. Speaker, I am quite sure that even though we are entering into a Presidential election no one in the Congress would in any way want to imply to the country at large, particularly in view of the very fine conduct and behavior of the Congress in the direction of adequate appropriations for necessary defense of the Nation, that the Commander in Chief of the Army or the Navy was in any way contributing by delinquence, either of an indifferent nature or otherwise, to delay in the production of those things that are required for the defense of this country. I am quite sure the amiable, estimable, and very patriotic gentleman from Connecticut [Mr. MILLER] felt completely justified from some source of information in which he had confidence in making that contribution indicating that this delay was due to an inherent weakness in the White House. I am quite sure he will be the first to make a statement to the House in the event the information given me by Mr. McReynolds that I have just read into the RECORD is sustained by the investigation the gentleman from Connecticut may make.

I merely appear at this time in the hope that by taking the time of the House at this late hour I may help in bringing about a little more sober approach from both sides of the aisle to the deliberations of the Congress that relate to the consideration of defense items, whether it be the bill that is now before us on calling out the National Guard, the selective-service bill that will probably come to us when the Senate has disposed of it, the excess profits tax bill, or any other measure that is related to the defense of the Nation. Certainly, no one in the Congress wants, unwittingly or otherwise, to make a contribution to the enemies of this form of government by offering an immature remark or observation that might lend aid or comfort to the enemies of this country.

Mr. HOUSTON. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. McKEOUGH. I yield to the gentleman from Kansas.

Mr. HOUSTON. Is there any reason on earth for anyone, be he a Member of this House or not, to doubt the authenticity of the statement the gentleman has received from Mr. McReynolds?

Mr. McKEOUGH. I believe the gentleman's question flatters me. I naturally cannot answer for anybody in the House except myself. I repeat, I am quite sure that the gentleman from Connecticut will make such correction as his observations originally made may require in the event his investigation sustains the correctness of the information given to me in the letter from Mr. McReynolds. [Applause.]

[Here the gavel fell.]

REPORT TO THE PEOPLE OF BUTLER, HARVEY, M'PHERSON, SEDGWICK, AND SUMNER COUNTIES

Mr. HOUSTON. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for 1 minute.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Kansas?

There was no objection.

Mr. HOUSTON. Mr. Speaker, it has become customary for Members of Congress to give the people reports on the work performed, current problems, and our program for the future, and I submit my statement to the citizens of Butler, Harvey, McPherson, Sedgwick, and Sumner Counties of the State of Kansas.

This administration brought hope to a Nation where there was only despair. We brought action to solve the problems of the depression where there had only been inaction and bewilderment. Our program has been and will continue to be based on the democratic principle of doing the greatest good to the greatest number of our people.

The theory of the Jeffersonian or Democratic Party has been and is now that in order to make the country prosperous the first thing is to have all of the people reasonably prosperous so that they have buying power. If you give the man in the lower-income brackets sufficient prosperity, his buying power spreads and the best barometers of general business conditions are current tax receipts, movement of durable goods, and employment of workers.

Certain elements are filling the air with agonized cries about the shackling of business, the throttling of free enterprise, the destruction of initiative, and failure to wipe out all unemployment.

Let us see how business has been shackled. In 1932 the national income had dropped to less than $40,000,000,000. This administration therefore took over a concern which had been driven to the verge of bankruptcy. By swift and wise measures calculated to improve every element in the national economy, it steadily increased the national income from year to year until it is now almost $70,000,000,000—nearly twice the amount it was when the Government was handed over to it.

Business has been so badly shackled by this Democratic management that last year virtually every important concern in the country made greater profits than for years, and many of them doubled their earnings over the previous year. According to figures of the National Industrial Conference Board, a private organization which by no stretch of the imagination could be accused of being friendly to the present administration, 228 industrial corporations showed aggregate net profits, less deficits, of $740,000,000 for 1939, as against $338,000,000 in 1938, representing a gain of 90 percent.

It is true there is still unemployment—nobody knows exactly how much except three or four newspaper columnists; but we do know that there are five or six millions less unemployed than there were in 1932. We do know that measures taken by this administration have taken care of the six or seven hundred thousand new employables who come into the field every year and have decreased in a marked degree the total of unemployed.

In addition to that, through the C. C. C. camps and the National Youth Administration it has given encouragement and work and schooling to millions of youth who might otherwise have drifted into vagabondage.

The unemployed who have been put to work by W. P. A. have made a great contribution to our national wealth. There is not a county or city throughout the Fifth District of Kansas which has not been enriched in some tangible way—a new or improved school, a water plant, new sewerage lines, a park, or swimming pool—through the labor of W. P. A. workers.

By giving the unemployed jobs on useful public projects we have also kept them off local relief rolls and preserved—in many cases, improved—their skills in preparation for the time when they could again find private employment.

While the W. P. A. construction program has been building up the physical plant of the Nation, the professional and service projects have been contributing to its health and culture. There are communities today in which the only public-health facilities are those provided by W. P. A., or where the only library is staffed by them, or the only opportunity for adults to study is afforded by W. P. A. teachers.

Through the W. P. A. there has been a huge increase in national wealth, resulting from the policy of meeting the unemployment problem by a work program rather than by a dole in the form of direct relief.

The gigantic task of rebuilding America charged to the Public Works Administration 7 years ago is practically complete. This program was created to provide jobs, to stimulate business, to increase the national purchasing power, and to help fulfill the needs of the people for permanent and useful public works.

The P. W. A. has operated on the basis of competitive bidding and contract award; private contractors and builders have constructed all of the P. W. A. projects. Thus millions of skilled and semiskilled workers have been given employment at construction sites at prevailing wages, and the services of a great number of architects and engineers have been utilized.

The following list of principal construction projects in the five counties of the Fifth Congressional District of Kansas indicates types of construction and the total amount of the funds that have been used or may be expended under present project approval limitations:

New Federal buildings have been erected at Augusta, Halstead, Lindsborg, and Caldwell in order that mail may be handled more expeditiously and the patrons of the Postal Service be served better.

In July 1938, at the request of Wellington City and Sumner County officials, the War Department and Department of Agriculture were persuaded to place a C. C. C. camp near Wellington. The soil-conservation work of the enrollees has been of incalculable value to the farmers of that vicinity and the monthly pay roll has been of importance to Wellington merchants.

In March 1940 the Soil Conservation Service made plans to close this camp over protests of civic organizations, financial institutions, merchants, city and county officials, farmers, and others of Sumner County. The chamber of commerce reported to me that over a year's work had been signed up; that there were 21 families living in Wellington connected with the camp with an annual pay roll of $28,000; that the enrollees received $18,000 monthly, and the camp was spending $15,000 for lumber, groceries, gas, cleaning, milk, and so forth, each month.

Through my connections at Washington, the camp was held in Sumner County and is there today. That is an example of the service I have rendered; a service that can be rendered only through a Representative having friends in the National Capital, and worth while friends can be secured there only by long service in Congress.

Mr. Speaker, realizing the numerous agricultural problems, I have given that part of my work careful study with the hope of being of service to agriculture, which is the basic industry of the State of Kansas. We have made progress along the line of formulating a definite, constructive program to meet new situations.

Surely the memory of farmers is not so short that they are unable to call to mind the 32-cent wheat, the 19-cent corn, the 3-cent hogs, and the 5-cent cotton under the previous administration.

They cannot be unmindful of the fact that the annual cash income of farmers in 1932 had sunk to the frightfully low level of $4,500,000,000, which, after farming expenses had been paid out of it, represented the startlingly low figure of $40 for every person living on farms. Nor can they fail to realize that under this administration immediate attention was given to the farm crisis and from then on the agricultural economy was steadily built up until in 1939 annual cash income of farmers had reached $8,500,000,000, or almost double that of 1932.

Are the farmers of the country to whose interests this Democratic administration has given constant study and attention, which has provided loans, which has reduced interest rates, which has provided relief in cases of drought and like disasters, which has planned soil conservation, and which has provided machinery enabling the farmers themselves to manage their own programs—are the farmers going to exchange this kind of administration for the party which for 50 years cared so little for the farmers that it never mentioned them in its national platforms?

Even though farmers have complaints and criticisms of existing agricultural programs, do they imagine for a moment that despite protestations of eager candidates that they can have anything to expect from a party with such a record?

We intend to keep on helping the farmer, and it remains my opinion that the cost-of-production plan to insure the farmer parity prices with industry offers the best solution of the farm problem. I introduced a cost-of-production bill and intend to again introduce it and vigorously support it. During my entire service in Congress I have never cast a single vote detrimental to agriculture.

I should like to call the attention of the membership of this House and the farmers of my district to the following statement showing the Federal benefits under the current and completed programs of the Agricultural Adjustment Administration:

	Current	Completed
Butler County	$437,736	$552,049
Harvey County	280,551	926,636
McPherson County	507,515	1,951,886
Sedgwick County	689,136	1,926,125
Sumner County	649,353	1,938,140

The Farm Security Administration, through its rural rehabilitation and farm tenant purchase programs, has helped farmers of my district to the extent of $500,000.

Through the Rural Electrification Administration hundreds of farms of the Fifth Kansas District have been electrified and the work of farm women and men has been made easier and their lives more comfortable. Over $1,000,000 has been expended for this program.

The Farm Credit Administration has expended $2,600,000 within my district during the period 1933 to 1939.

Classes other than farmers have every reason to think of this administration with satisfaction. Age may weaken the memory, but that of the old folks and the blind is not so impaired as not to be impressed with the fact that for the first time in the history of the Government their want has been alleviated.

The Social Security Board has expended in the Fifth Kansas District a total of $614,380 for the aged, the blind, and dependent children. Butler County received $88,786, Harvey County $36,035, McPherson County $41,901, Sedgwick County $370,405, and Sumner County $77,253.

The Home Owners' Loan Corporation aided distressed home owners of Butler County to the extent of $459,039, of Harvey County $301,847, of McPherson County $209,907, of Sedgwick County $6,182,490, and of Sumner County $398,381.

The Reconstruction Finance Corporation loaned residents of Butler County $500,005, of Harvey County $6,500, of McPherson County $130,401, of Sedgwick County $1,038,920, of Sumner County $27,067.

The Public Roads Administration's expenditures in Butler County total $391,726, in Harvey County $184,206, in McPherson County $323,043, in Sedgwick County $935,325, in Sumner County $274,204.

The Federal Housing Administration insured modernization and improvement loans in Butler County to the extent of $68,611, in Harvey County $27,942, in McPherson County $23,895, in Sedgwick County $480,185, in Sumner County $44,843. And mortgages accepted for insurance in Butler County totaled $358,350, in Harvey County $153,950, in McPherson County $315,900, in Sedgwick County $4,410,155, in Sumner County $89,000.

Other Federal expenditures in the Fifth Kansas District for the period from March 4, 1933, to June 30, 1939, bring the totals of repayable and nonrepayable items as follows:

	Repayable	Nonrepayable	Total
Butler County	$1,725,753	$2,829,872	$4,555,625
Harvey County	700,117	1,919,472	2,619,589
McPherson County	818,748	3,309,217	4,127,965
Sedgwick County	8,314,892	15,242,515	23,557,407
Grand total	12,975,159	27,600,129	40,575,288

This country is now driving hard to rebuild our national defense, and Kansas will benefit in increased employment, wages, and sales resulting from the expansion program. Wichita airplane factories have received Government contracts totaling $15,500,000, and the production and transportation of materials for arms of all kinds will provide millions of man-hours of work for Kansans.

As I view the state of the world today, we have every reason to rejoice that we are citizens of the United States of America. Justification for this feeling is to be found not only in the contrast between our own condition and that of millions of people in Europe and Asia who are either at war or on the verge of it.

Every man, woman, and child capable of reading or listening to the radio knows of the slaughter of human beings, the destruction of property, the tearing apart of families, the hunger, destitution, and suffering which are the result of the mad and savage struggles now going on across the ocean, and knows equally well that such happenings are not taking place here. We can and do sympathize with these unfortunate peoples, but at the same time we can without the least condescension be glad that circumstances have not involved us in a like fate. And I firmly believe that an overwhelming majority of Americans are determined that nothing shall bring this country into the cruel and senseless conflict which ambitious governments have inflicted upon their patient peoples.

I shall continue my vigorous support of measures to insure the peace of America; and having attained a thorough understanding of the conditions and problems of my district and State, through experience, and having gained an important place on the Committee on Appropriations by seniority, I am in position to effectively serve my constituents and the Nation.

During the period of my service as a Member of Congress I have supported and voted for every measure of benefit to labor.

I served as a member of the House Committee on Veterans' Affairs for 2 years, and have sponsored several bills for the benefit of veterans, their widows, and dependents. I have supported every bill of that nature that has come before Congress, and will continue that policy.

On every occasion I have promptly signed petitions to bring old-age pension bills before the Congress for action, and will continue my work for a Federal old-age pension system.

All legislation and appropriations for vocational education and Federal aid for our school system have had my support, and the many letters of commendation received from educators and parents of my district have been deeply appreciated.

I believe I am correct in saying that I was the first Member of Congress to make a speech on the floor of the House demanding an appropriation of $25,000,000 for the control of venereal diseases, and I am happy to report that the Federal Government is now cooperating with the various States in the fight on social diseases and contributing about $6,000,000 annually.

Recognizing the fact that oil is a leading "crop" in Kansas, the estimated value of which runs about one-third of the total value of the wheat, corn, cattle, hogs, and milk produced in our State, I have consistently fought for legislation beneficial to the oil industry and vigorously opposed by voice and vote that which would have been detrimental. I appeared before the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce in opposition to the Cole bill; and before the Ways and Means Committee in opposition to excessive importation of Venezuelan oil.

I have urged the repeal of the Federal tax on gasoline and lubricating oil, and worked for an increase in excise taxes on imported petroleum and petroleum products. I supported the "hot oil" bill, upheld the conservation laws of Kansas as being sound in principle and practice and administered equitably, and worked for measures that increase employment of American workers in the oil fields and refineries.

I have consistently supported legislation beneficial to railroad workers and the transportation systems such as the Railroad Retirement Act, Railroad Unemployment Insurance Act, and the Transportation Act; and have the endorsement of the railroad brotherhoods.

In addition to the old-age pension bills, farm bills, veterans' bills, aviation bills, scores of private relief bills, and others of a public nature, I introduced bills to establish an airplane engine research laboratory at Wichita, to establish an aeronautical school in Sedgwick County, and worked for the placement of defense facilities and training programs in my district.

I have endeavored to serve every constitutent cheerfully and to the best of my ability whether his or her request was large or small; regardless of race, creed, or political affiliation. Every reasonable demand has been met; every letter answered promptly; every service within the province of my office offered freely. That will continue to be my policy.

I have kept the faith and explicitly carried out my promises. My people had an opportunity to observe the type of service that I have been rendering them during the past 6 years, and they have kept in touch with my legislative record, which is an open book.

The thousands of letters that I have received from time to time thanking me for the many things that I have done for my constituents and my district, as well as congratulatory messages on my votes on many important bills, are sufficient evidence that I have fought a good fight.

I have endeavored to submerge personalities in the interest of principles; I have attempted to reconcile my views with those of my colleagues on all principles where national issues were involved.

I have tried to practice tolerance and my record discloses the fact that nowhere and at no time have I ever indulged in bitter personalities or in conduct unbecoming a Member of this honorable body.

I fully realize that because of the ruthless war which is raging in Europe and the many serious problems confronting Congress and the country, this is no time for Members of Congress to desert their duty to their people and their country and engage in a political campaign for personal gain. It is obvious that we must remain at our posts in Washington even though we may be subjected during the coming weeks to criticism by opponents and have no opportunity to answer, but I am perfectly willing to leave my case in the hands of the people of the Fifth District of Kansas, and abide by their decision.

Mr. Speaker, in conclusion, I wish to emphasize my support of that part of the 1940 platform of the Democratic Party which reads:

> We will not participate in foreign wars, and we will not send our Army, naval, or air forces to fight in foreign lands outside of the Americas, except in case of attack. We favor and shall rigorously enforce and defend the Monroe Doctrine.

That, in my opinion, is the most important declaration of policy that any party or man can now state, and it must be adhered to so that the common, average citizens of this country may continue to live simply and happily and safely in a land which is a democracy. [Applause.]

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

Mr. MURDOCK of Arizona. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my own remarks in the RECORD and include therein the story of an unusual act of heroism on the part of a small boy, in the hope that other small boys may pattern their conduct thereafter.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Arizona?

There was no objection.

EDITORIAL POLICY OF WALLACE'S FARMER AND IOWA HOMESTEAD—PERSONAL STATEMENT

Mr. GILLETTE. Mr. President, day before yesterday I asked unanimous consent, which was granted, to have inserted in the RECORD an editorial from the current issue of Wallace's Farmer and Iowa Homestead, which is published in my State, at Des Moines, Iowa. Several Senators have inquired whether the editorial in any way reflected the views of the candidate for Vice President on the Democratic ticket, the present Secretary of Agriculture, or whether he has anything to do with the editorial columns of the publication.

In fairness to him, I wish to state publicly that he has nothing to do with the editorial policy of that publication, and I am sure that the editorial statement which I placed in the RECORD does not reflect the views of the Secretary of Agriculture.

DISPOSITION OF EXECUTIVE PAPERS

The PRESIDENT pro tempore laid before the Senate letters from the Archivist of the United States, transmitting, pursuant to law, lists of papers and documents on the files of the Departments of the Interior, of Agriculture, the United States Civil Service Commission, the Federal Works Agency, Work Projects Administration, and the United States Housing Authority, which are not needed in the conduct of business and have no permanent value or historical interest, and requesting action looking to their disposition, which, with the accompanying papers, were referred to a Joint Select Committee on the Disposition of Papers in the Executive Departments.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore appointed Mr. BARKLEY and Mr. TOBEY members of the committee on the part of the Senate.

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS

The PRESIDENT pro tempore laid before the Senate the petition of Charles Forney, of Norfolk, Va., praying for an investigation as to certain financial transactions concerning the Newport News (Va.) Ship Building and Dry Dock Co., which was referred to the Committee on Banking and Currency.

He also laid before the Senate a resolution adopted by the fifteenth annual convention of the Police Conference of the State of New York, favoring an adequate national-defense program so as to meet any threat to the freedom of the United States, which was ordered to lie on the table.

Mr. VANDENBERG presented memorials of sundry citizens of the State of Michigan, remonstrating against the enactment of compulsory military training legislation, which were ordered to lie on the table.

Mr. HOLT presented the memorial of members of the Baptist Young People's Union of the Baptist Temple, Charleston, W. Va., remonstrating against the enactment of any form of compulsory military training legislation, which was ordered to lie on the table.

He also presented a resolution of the executive board of Labor's Non-Partisan League, Marion County, W. Va., protesting against the enactment of pending compulsory military-training legislation or any other form of peacetime conscription, which was ordered to lie on the table.

Mr. AUSTIN, from the Committee on Immigration, to which was referred the bill (H. R. 8551) for the relief of Xenophon George Panos, reported it without amendment and submitted a report (No. 2009) thereon.

Mr. HERRING, from the Committee on Immigration, to which was referred the bill (H. R. 8830) to amend the records at the port of New York to show the admission of Steve Zegura, Jr., and B. Dragomir Zegura as aliens admitted for permanent residence, reported it without amendment and submitted a report (No. 2010) thereon.

Mr. CAPPER, from the Committee on Immigration, to which was referred the bill (H. R. 8906) to record the lawful admission to the United States for permanent residence to Nicholas G. Karas, reported it without amendment and submitted a report (No. 2011) thereon.

ENROLLED BILLS PRESENTED

Mrs. CARAWAY, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported that that committee presented to the President of the United States the following enrolled bills:

On August 8, 1940:

S. 4106. An act to authorize the construction of certain facilities in Marjorie Park, Davis Island, Tampa, Fla., and for other purposes.

On August 12, 1940:

S. 4070. An act to provide for more uniform coverage of certain persons employed in coal-mining operations with respect to insurance benefits provided for by certain Federal acts, and for other purposes.

BILLS INTRODUCED

Bills were introduced, read the first time, and, by unanimous consent, the second time, and referred as follows:

By Mr. BYRD:

S. 4276. A bill for the relief of Virginia Bowen, Willie W. Hudson, and John L. Walker; to the Committee on Claims.

By Mr. SHEPPARD:

S. 4277. A bill to protect the rights of inventors; to the Committee on Military Affairs.

SELECTIVE COMPULSORY MILITARY SERVICE—AMENDMENTS

Mr. HAYDEN and Mr. SHEPPARD each submitted an amendment intended to be proposed by them, respectively, to the bill (S. 4164) to protect the integrity and institutions of the United States through a system of selective compulsory military training and service, which were ordered to lie on the table and to be printed.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. President, I desire to offer an amendment to the pending bill (S. 4164) to protect the integrity and institutions of the United States through a system of selective compulsory military training and service, which I ask may lie on the table. The amendment inserts on page 23, line 5, after the word "duty", the following: "or who is hereafter assigned to active or training duty".

This would have the effect of insuring that Government employees who are also in the Reserve forces would be given their jobs back after released from active duty.

The language of S. 4164 seeks to do this for all conscripted persons, but it does not apply to those Reserves who are now in the Reserve force but not on active duty and who may enter active duty from the regular Reserve forces.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment of the Senator from Massachusetts will lie on the table and be printed.

SECOND SUPPLEMENTAL NATIONAL DEFENSE APPROPRIATIONS—AMENDMENT

Mr. MILLER submitted an amendment intended to be proposed by him to the bill (H. R. 10263) making supplemental appropriations for the national defense for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1941, and for other purposes, which was referred to the Committee on Appropriations and ordered to be printed, as follows:

SEC. —. The Secretary of War may allocate to the Corps of Engineers any of the construction works required to carry out the national-defense program and may transfer to that agency the funds necessary for the execution of the works so allocated. Funds thus transferred may be expended in the prosecution of said works, including the acquisition of lands therefor, in the same manner as funds regularly appropriated for maintenance and improvement of rivers and harbors, and the statutory authorities and rules and regulations applicable to the maintenance and improvement of rivers and harbors shall apply likewise to the construction works allocated to the Corps of Engineers pursuant to this section.

ADDRESS BY SENATOR VANDENBERG ON NATIONAL DEFENSE

[Mr. VANDENBERG asked and obtained leave to have printed in the RECORD an address delivered by him at Lansing, Mich., August 14, 1940, on the subject of national defense, which appears in the Appendix.]

[Mr. HILL asked and obtained leave to have printed in the RECORD the column under the heading "Humor from the Ozarks," written by Hon. DEWEY SHORT, a Representative from Missouri substituting for Harlan Miller, and published in the Washington Post of today, which appears in the Appendix.]

WATER TRANSPORTATION—LETTER FROM ASSOCIATION OF AMERICAN RAILROADS

[Mr. TRUMAN asked and obtained leave to have printed in the RECORD a letter from R. V. Fletcher, vice president and general counsel of the Association of American Railroads, in reply to a charge that the Panama Canal Act would be repealed by the conference report on Senate bill 2009, which appears in the Appendix.]

THE HOOVER RELIEF PROPOSAL—ARTICLE BY WALTER LIPPMANN

[Mr. WILEY asked and obtained leave to have printed in the RECORD an article by Walter Lippmann entitled "The Hoover Relief Proposal," which appears in the Appendix.]

SELECTIVE COMPULSORY MILITARY SERVICE

The Senate resumed the consideration of the bill (S. 4164) to protect the integrity and institutions of the United States through a system of selective compulsory military training and service.

Mr. DOWNEY obtained the floor.

Mr. VANDENBERG. Mr. President, will the Senator yield to me?

Mr. DOWNEY. I yield to the Senator from Michigan.

Mr. VANDENBERG. Mr. President, I present an editorial from the Grand Rapids Press entitled "Local Recruiting." From this editorial it appears that a distinguished Member of another distinguished legislative forum asserted in debate the other day that—

"Senator VANDENBERG'S own home town" had recruited only one man in a recent Army recruiting drive. He concluded that even the Senator must admit that voluntary enlistment "had already been tried and found wanting" as a means of enlarging American defense forces.

Mr. President, the fact happens to be that the recruiting quota in my home city of Grand Rapids has been filled to overflowing every month this year.

I ask that the editorial be printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the editorial was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

LOCAL RECRUITING

Another sample of irresponsible congressional conscription debate was furnished by the speech of Representative PATRICK, Alabama Democrat, in the House of Representatives Monday. Patrick asserted that Grand Rapids, "Senator VANDENBERG'S own home town," had recruited only one man in a recent Army recruiting drive. He concluded that even the Senator must admit that voluntary enlistment "had already been tried and found wanting" as a means of enlarging American defense forces.

The fact is that the Grand Rapids Army recruiting office has established a most enviable recruiting record in the last two and a half months. The local office enlisted 29 men in June, 59 in July, and already has enlisted 20 men in August with tentative acceptance of 15 more. The June and July enlistments actually broke all peacetime recruiting records here. Moreover, the local office was closed in January and was given a very limited number of vacancies to fill in February, March, April, and May. These vacancies were filled.

Last week a crowd of more than 50,000 local persons turned out at the airport to see a display of equipment by a mechanized Army recruiting demonstration unit. The local office was swamped with men desiring Army enlistment information the next day, according to the officer in charge. The visiting Army detachment actually did enlisting in smaller cities visited which did not have regular recruiting offices. But its function in larger cities with regular recruiting offices was solely to arouse public interest and enthusiasm for enlistment.

Perhaps Representative PATRICK mistook a 1-night demonstration of equipment for a 2-week recruiting drive. Or perhaps any rumor or unverified statement is good for ammunition against a leader of an opposite political party.

The public desires a calm and considered debate on an issue as vital to democracy as conscription. There is room for an honest difference of opinion on the issue. Not all opponents of conscription are "fifth columnists." Not all proponents are ipso facto "Hitlerites."

Certainly little is gained for the cause of conscription by misrepresenting a city which has one of the best recruiting records in the entire Sixth Corps Area. A nonpartisan study of the facts, not the rumors, of voluntary enlistment is sorely needed in Washington now.

Mr. HOLMAN. Mr. President, will the Senator from California yield to me a moment, that I may insert a memorandum in the RECORD?

Mr. DOWNEY. I yield.

Mr. HOLMAN. Mr. President, I am just in receipt of the following letter from Lt. Col. D. A. Watt, connected with the Committee on Military Affairs of the Senate:

UNITED STATES SENATE, COMMITTEE ON MILITARY AFFAIRS,
August 15, 1940.

Senator RUFUS C. HOLMAN,
Senate Office Building, Washington, D. C.

DEAR SENATOR HOLMAN: As requested I send you herewith a memorandum on the subject of equipment and recruiting and the necessity for prompt action to expand the Army without delay.

Very respectfully,

D. A. WATT,
Lieutenant Colonel.

I ask unanimous consent that there be printed in the RECORD the memorandum referred to in the letter of Lieutenant Colonel Watt.

There being no objection, the memorandum was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

MEMORANDUM

Statements have appeared in the press conveying the impression that the War Department is not prepared to train 400,000 men should such a group be drafted this fall, and reference to lack of equipment and supplies has been mentioned on the floor of the Senate.

Obviously the War Department would not urge that such a force be drafted this fall for training if the Department was not prepared and had the necessary equipment on hand with which to commence and continue training of this large group.

Trainees who will be drafted this fall will be attached to Regular Army and National Guard units for intensive training.

The National Guard will enter the Federal service fully equipped and will have sufficient equipment or be issued additional equipment to permit the guard to proceed immediately with the training of draft men attached to it.

The Regular Army has sufficient equipment already issued to Regular units or in reserve which will be brought out of reserve, which will permit the Regular Army immediately to proceed with the training of men drafted and attached to the Regular Army for training.

It is unfortunate that the impression prevails among a few groups that the Army is not prepared to train the men they have asked for. The impression that there is not a sufficient amount of equipment on hand now is erroneous.

The military experts who have kept in close touch with world conditions and have studied the situation from day to day believe that this country faces a peril which necessitates immediate preparation to offset the peril. The preparation considered necessary as seen by the War Department includes the drafting of 400,000 men this fall. It is important that this large group of men be procured without delay. Normal recruiting will not produce this force within a limited period. By a limited period it is meant that the 400,000 should be procured within a few weeks, and in large increments. Recruiting would bring men into the service in driblets and delay efficient processing and training and it would take many months eventually to procure the 400,000.

Time is the essential factor. A trained reserve of men should be acquired by the Government at the earliest practicable moment. It is the only way to prepare for the adequate defense of the country.

Mr HOLMAN. I thank the Senator for yielding.

Mr. ASHURST. Mr. President, will the Senator from California yield to me?

Mr. DOWNEY. I yield to the Senator from Arizona.

Mr. ASHURST. Mr. President, referring to the subject of voluntary enlistments, no one should be surprised that there might apparently be some backwardness or delay in voluntary enlistments; but such delay, if any, has been occasioned not a little by the War Department, which has flagrantly disregarded the law of June 4, 1920, which permitted 1-year enlistments and gave to the soldier the right to choose what the period of his enlistment would be, whether 1 year or 3. The evidence is not conclusive, but is strong, to the effect that the War Department has been lacking in frankness, has been disingenuous and unfair, in that in establishing recruiting stations the recruiting officers have notified the applicants seeking to enlist that they could not enlist for 1 year. That circumstance, Mr. President, does not afford us much faith or confidence in a department which now asks for power to deal with larger and graver matters when in the smaller matters it has been remiss, and, in my judgment, unfair to the man seeking to enlist for 1 year.

Mr. VANDENBERG. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. DOWNEY. I yield to the Senator from Michigan.

Mr. VANDENBERG. I think the Senator from Arizona might add, however, that, in spite of this prejudice and in spite of this handicap, every quota the Army has sought has been filled.

Mr. ASHURST. I am glad to have that contribution.

MANGANESE

Now, Mr. President, a few words upon another subject.

On the 7th of November 1929 I vexed the ears of the Senate for nearly 3 hours in a debate wherein I argued that adequate supplies of high-grade manganese ores could be found within the United States, and in that speech I descended into particulars. I named the States in which manganese ores are found. I named the counties, the mining districts where manganese ores were located, and I descended further into particulars, and in some instances supplied the names of the mines in the United States whence high-grade manganese ores could be obtained.

Manganese is absolutely necessary in the manufacture of steel. It is used to "sweeten" pig iron. For years a determined effort was made to prevent the imposition of a protective tariff on imported manganese. I wish not to talk now about the tariff question; but it is true that the users of manganese, the large steel companies, in bygone years employed their power—I do not charge corruption—to prevent the imposition of a tariff on manganese. That is human nature. That is probably enlightened selfishness, for they would, forsooth, prefer to buy manganese in foreign countries because they believe they might secure it cheaper than at home. It has been said that the steel interests are now indifferent as to a tariff; but my opinion is that if they are not urging free trade on manganese they occupy the position of Addison's valetudinarian, who, whilst complaining that he was starving to death, grew so fat that he was shamed into silence.

The following is an extract from questions which were asked by radio commentators and answered by members of the National Defense Advisory Commission in a broadcast over the four radio networks from Washington, August 8, 1940, giving remarks of Mr. Edward R. Stettinius, Jr., in charge of the Raw Materials Division of the National Defense Commission:

Question. Of course, you must encounter numerous difficulties, Mr. Stettinius. Could you give us an example?

Answer. Yes. A very practical difficulty, for instance, involves one of our sources of high-grade manganese—an indispensable alloy for the manufacture of steel. It is in Brazil. Transportation to that source is inadequate, and to get the supplies we need a railroad in Brazil will have to be rebuilt. That is typical of the kind of problems we face.

The United States Steel Corporation owns manganese mines in Brazil.

According to United States Bureau of Mines release of August 10, 1940, manganese ore imported from Brazil during the month of June ran 40.9 percent metallic manganese. According to Government specifications, ore running below 48 percent metallic manganese is classified as low grade.

If approved by Congress, it is expected that a portion of the $500,000,000 Export-Import Bank fund will be used in the construction of manganese plants and railroads in Brazil or other South American countries. Such plants can be constructed in the United States just as quickly as in Brazil and offer far more security to our own country.

It would seem certain Congress should not be content to see American money spent for the development of manganese in Brazil while domestic manganese mines with enormous quantities of manganese-ore content higher than the ore content of the Brazil mines remain idle, with American miners searching for employment.

The argument, to my mind, is conclusive that if manganese be, as it is, a metal necessary in the manufacture of ordnance and other munitions, for a stronger reason, a fortiori, we ought to develop the home mines. Senators will remember that in the dark days of March and April 1918 our miners and prospectors in response to the call of their Government went out upon the hills, smote the obdurate face of Nature to compel her to bring forth her treasures, not of gold, not of silver, but of manganese; that we thereby stimulated the production of manganese, but at that same time we were bringing overseas half our manganese. Who does not recall the mysterious disappearance of the steamship Cyclops, which was last heard of during March 1918 somewhere in the West Indies; she was bound for an Atlantic port in the United States from Barbados, laden with manganese ore; she had a complement of 211 men, 15 officers, and 57 passengers. Nothing was ever heard of her further, and men and cargo were all lost; they went down to the airless meadows of the cavernous deep. Not a spar has ever come to the surface to indicate her fate. What was the mission of that ship? With what was she laden? She was bringing manganese to the United States to be used in the manufacture of our ordnance and other munitions of war. All we needed to do was to develop our own mines.

Mr. President, it is shocking to consider importing manganese from a foreign country when we have abundant supplies in our own country.

I ask permission to include in the RECORD as a part of my remarks a list of the States containing manganese deposits.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Without objection, the list will be printed in the RECORD.

(See exhibit A.)

Mr. ASHURST. I now make a passageway so that the Senator from Virginia [Mr. GLASS], whom I love so much, may take his seat. That reminds me that while Virginia may not have gold mines or silver mines, Virginia has many manganese mines. How does my beloved friend the Senator from Virginia view the idea of proposing to spend the money of our taxpayers to build railroads in Brazil to transport ores that are only 40 percent metal content when in his own State and my own State there are manganese mines with a content of metal of more than 48 percent?

Mr. President, this manganese question is a subject to which I have given not a few days, not a few weeks, but years of study. I hope I am not unduly influenced by the consideration that in Arizona there are deposits of high-grade manganese ores. If Arizona had no manganese mines, I should be just as zealous in my efforts to see to it that home industry and American miners, rather than Brazilian miners, were employed. I opposed the reciprocal-trade treaties for the reason that copper, forsooth, may be mined in Africa and in South America by cheap and underpaid labor and thus cause ruinous competition.

If there be anything in the philosophy of developing and sustaining our own country, it is that Americans should have the advantage of the American market, and if public moneys are to be spent, all things being equal those public moneys should be expended in the United States.

Mr. WHEELER. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. ASHURST. I have not the floor, but if the Senator from California will permit, I yield to the Senator.

Mr. DOWNEY. I yield.

Mr. WHEELER. First of all, I wish to compliment the Senator for the fight which he has made for the manganese producers of the United States. I was shocked to hear him say that a railroad was being built in Brazil to manganese mines which were owned by the United States Steel Corporation.

Mr. ASHURST. I have given the substance of the broadcast.

Mr. WHEELER. I am sure the Senator recalls that he and a number of us made a fight to get a tariff on manganese when the Smoot-Hawley bill was before the Senate in order to shut out the managense that was coming in from Russia.

Mr. ASHURST. I do.

Mr. WHEELER. At that time some of the friends of the Bethlehem Steel Co., and I think perhaps the Bethlehem Steel Co. also, had a big contract with Russia, and they were importing manganese from Russia. It will be recalled also that all the big steel companies were opposed to a tariff upon manganese, because they wanted to import it.

When the W. P. A. first went into operation the Senator from Arizona and several others of us called attention to the fact that some stock piles of manganese should be established in this country, and that some of the W. P. A. workers should be used for that purpose, because the manganese could be used in the event of war, and we would not have to be importing it from other countries such as Russia, from which we might be shut off.

Mr. ASHURST. The Senator is correct, and I recall with cameolike distinctness that it was proved, during the latter part of October or early in November 1929, that the large steel companies had contracts with Russia for the delivery in the United States of manganese which was mined in Russia by forced labor, slave labor, or poorly paid labor.

Mr. CHAVEZ. Mr. President, will the Senator permit an interruption?

Mr. ASHURST. I yield.

Mr. CHAVEZ. I wish to clarify what the Senator from Montana had in mind a moment ago, and this statement is correct. A few days ago one of the commentators, Mr. Warner, was asking questions of Mr. Stettinius with reference to special and strategic war materials, and among the things Mr. Stettinious answered about was manganese. Mr. Stettinius made the statement that, so far as Brazil was concerned, in order to get the manganese actually needed, it would be necessary to build a railroad. If the Senator will permit me for a moment, with the indulgence of the Senator from California—I know what the Senator from Arizona has in mind with reference to his State, but that is immaterial.

Mr. ASHURST. Immaterial.

Mr. CHAVEZ. New Mexico has the same problem. We have in New Mexico a proven capacity for the production of manganese of as high a grade as 53 percent, and I know that, if the Government would contract for the establishment of the stock piles there is talk about in Arizona, New Mexico, California, and throughout the West, thousands of people would be taken off the relief rolls and at the same time the emergency for such war materials would be met.

Mr. ASHURST. I thank the Senator for his contribution.

Mr. President, manganese is found in Alabama, Arizona, Arkansas, California, Colorado, Georgia, Idaho, Maine, Maryland, Michigan, Minnesota, Mississippi, Missouri, Montana, and Nevada.

There sits on my extreme left here the able junior Senator from Nevada [Mr. McCARRAN]. Presiding with dignity and fairness over the Senate at this moment is the senior Senator from Nevada [Mr. PITTMAN]. How do they like the idea of the importation of manganese with many manganese mines in their States that can produce high-grade ore?

To continue the list, manganese is also produced in New Jersey, New Mexico, North Carolina, Oklahoma, Oregon, Pennsylvania, South Carolina, South Dakota, and Tennessee.

Manganese is found in Texas, Utah, Vermont, Virginia, Washington, and Wyoming.

Mr. President, a vast deal of misinformation and erroneous propaganda have been sent forth alleging that there is very little low-grade manganese ore in the United States and that there is even a still smaller quantity of high-grade manganese ore in the United States; thus the impression has been created in some quarters that our steel manufacturers would dwindle and would probably disappear if the steel interests depended upon the United States for their manganese, but the very reverse is true, to wit, there is an abundance of manganese ore, both of the high grade and the low grade, in the United States.

Within the past few years chemistry and metallurgical methods for beneficiating these manganese ores have made enormous progress. Indeed, these discoveries and advances in chemistry, geophysics, metallurgy, and chemical engineering within the past 20 years are so dazzling that they almost rival the old dream of the Alembic, and when we invoice and catalog the recent great discoveries in science we feel that Aladdin's Lamp and the Purse of Fortunatus in comparison are tame and prosaic. To this generation has been given the keys to the kingdom of the material world.

No well-informed man would attempt to delimit the boundaries of chemical science or deny that the quiet laboratory may signify more agencies for national defense and more potentialities for the victories of peace than a whole regiment, and that sometimes a timid and bespectacled chemist is as important in bringing about victory in war or in advancing peaceful pursuits and mobilizing the resources of civilization as are bankers, parliamentarians, and government executives. Just so, within the past two decades, scientific chemistry now beneficiates manganese ores, and these manganese-ore deposits of our own country are ample to supply the needs and requirements of our industries.

Therefore, when we are told in lugubrious jeremiads that there is not a sufficient quantity of manganese in the United States for our industries, we reply to such a plea of pessimism and defeatism that the prospector and miner, that science and chemistry, refute such doleful assertions. Science and her wizardries may with confidence be depended upon to beneficiate our manganese ores.

Mr. MILLER. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. ASHURST. I am ashamed to trespass further on the patience of the Senator from California.

Mr. DOWNEY. I shall be glad to yield for a question or a brief comment. I think the question of strategic materials and manganese is sufficiently important to justify a separate argument. I am willing to yield to the Senator, however, for a brief comment or question.

Mr. MILLER. Merely an interjection.

Mr. ASHURST. I thank the Senator from California.

Mr. DOWNEY. I yield to the Senator from Arkansas.

Mr. MILLER. Mr. President, the policy of our Government is extremely short-sighted in the development of strategic and critical materials. Some of my constituents are now in the city of Washington offering to sell mercury to the Government, and they cannot get any consideration or any offer. The plea is that we want to conserve our minerals here and buy foreign minerals.

Mr. McCARRAN and Mr. GURNEY addressed the Chair.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from California yield; and if so, to whom?

Mr. DOWNEY. I yield first to the Senator from Nevada.

Mr. McCARRAN. I wish only to add a word from my study of the subject to the explanation made by the able Senator from Arizona, who has always been solicitous of the metal miners of America.

Mr. ASHURST. I thank the Senator.

Mr. McCARRAN. For the last 6 years we have been trying to encourage manganese mining in the United States. My colleague, the able President pro tempore of the Senate, who presides over the Senate at this moment, joined me and the Representative from Nevada in making frequent calls upon those in authority with the purpose of seeing if we might preserve the right of American miners to work in the manganese industry. But we have been confronted with the same statement that was repeated by the Senator from Arizona—that we did not have manganese deposits, or that our manganese deposits were of too low a grade. We were confronted with that statement during the argument over the reduction of the tariff on manganese. The tariff on manganese was reduced 50 percent, but Brazil was not the beneficiary. The argument was made that the tariff should be reduced under the good-neighbor policy for the benefit of Brazil, but the result was that, under the most-favored-nation clause, Russia, being able to produce manganese much cheaper than it could be produced in Brazil, was able to export manganese to this country, which put the Brazil industry out of business so far as the United States was concerned. American manganese miners, who could be working for a decent wage and maintaining American standards of living, have been put out of business.

I am grateful to the Senator from California for yielding.

Mr. DOWNEY. I yield now to the Senator from South Dakota.

Mr. GURNEY. Mr. President, I desire to bring to the attention of the Senator from Arizona and the Senate the fact that in 1929 a survey of manganese production in South Dakota showed resources of approximately a hundred million tons, and that we were using about a million tons a year.

A recent survey conducted by our own colleges in South Dakota, to some extent backed by the Bureau of Mines, shows a higher grade ore than developed by the survey made some 10 or 11 years ago. In fact, we in South Dakota now believe that that ore is of sufficiently high enough grade so that it can be mined economically.

A few years ago, at about the time the reciprocal-trade treaty with Brazil went into effect, the tariff was lowered to a point which caused development to be stopped in our State. A company had started production, or started surveys, took options, and spent about $400,000. At that particular moment the tariff was reduced to $5.60 a ton, thereby making it impossible to continue with that development in the State of South Dakota, where there is a supply sufficient for 100 years, and therefore that company's investment was lost. I thank the Senator from California for yielding to me so I could make that statement.

Mr. ASHURST. Mr. President, I thank the Senator from California for being so generous in allowing me to speak in his time.

Mr. DOWNEY. Mr. President, I wish to congratulate the distinguished Senator from Arizona on raising the question of strategic war materials. It is my own opinion that in this question are involved more vital issues than even in the preparation of our military forces, and I hope that the distinguished Senator from Arizona [Mr. ASHURST] will carry on the discussion at greater length, as it is of vital importance to us all.

Mr. President, I have pending an amendment to the proposed measure for compulsory military training, which, in brief, provides that the President of the United States shall begin construction of superhighway systems in the United States, under the supervision of the military, to the fullest extent necessary to eliminate all unemployment, provision being made that any young men who are given military training shall be given preferential right of employment in such highway construction work upon their leaving the camps.

I now request that the clerk read the amendment so that the Senate may be advised more particularly about what I am speaking.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The clerk will read.

The CHIEF CLERK. On page 30, at the end of section 12, it is proposed to insert the following new section:

SEC. 13. (a) In order to provide additional facilities for the national defense, improve the instrumentalities of interstate commerce, promote the public safety, stimulate business recovery and the national income, develop outlets for our national savings, increase the public revenues, and eliminate unemployment, the President is authorized to provide for the construction, maintenance, and administration of an integrated system of supersafety highways throughout the United States, together with such air fields and military bases as he may deem advisable. The plans and specifications for such highway system, which shall include at least three transcontinental supersafety highways running east and west and at least three such highways running north and south, shall be prepared under the direction of the President by such agency or agencies as he may designate after consultation and agreements with representatives of the appropriate authorities of the various States with respect to the location, building, and maintenance of such highways. All such plans and specifications shall be submitted to the President for final approval. The construction of any highways for which the plans and specifications are so approved shall be under the direction and supervision of the Secretary of War and the Chief of Engineers of the Army, and the amount of such construction to be undertaken during each of the 10 fiscal years, commencing with the fiscal year 1941, shall be determined by the President with a view to restoring full employment to the people of the United States at the earliest practicable date. In selecting persons for employment in connection with highway construction, under this section preference shall be given to the persons inducted for training and service as provided for in this act who have satisfactorily completed the required period of such training and service and who have received certificates under section 8 (a) of this act.

(b) In order to provide the necessary funds for the construction of such integrated highway system the Reconstruction Finance Corporation is authorized and directed to make available to the Secretary of War such sums as the President may from time to time request for such purpose, and the aggregate amount of notes, bonds, debentures, and other such obligations which the Corporation is authorized to issue and have outstanding at any one time under the provisions of law in force on the date of enactment of this act is hereby increased by an amount sufficient to carry out the provisions of this section: Provided, That any such obligations issued by the Corporation for the purposes of this subsection may mature not more than 60 years from their respective dates of issue.

(c) The Secretary of the Treasury is authorized and directed to pay to the Reconstruction Finance Corporation from time to time, upon request of the board of directors of the Corporation and with the approval of the Federal Loan Administrator, such sums as may be necessary for payment by the Corporation of the principal of and interest on any obligations issued by the Corporation for the purposes of subsection (b) of this section; and there are hereby authorized to be appropriated, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, such sums as may be necessary for making such payments.

(d) The Secretary of the Treasury and the Reconstruction Finance Corporation shall submit to the Congress in January of each year their recommendations with respect to the most appropriate method of providing the funds for making the payments required by subsection (c) of this section.

(e) The President is authorized to make such rules and regulations as may be necessary to carry out the provisions of this section.

(f) The President is further authorized, with the consent and cooperation of the Governments of Mexico and the other republics in North America, to provide for the construction of such highways in Mexico and such other republics as will aid in the defense of the Panama Canal and North America.

On page 30, line 13, after the word "act", it is proposed to insert "except the provisions of section 13."

On page 30, line 9, it is proposed to change "13" to "14", and in line 17, to change "14" to "15."

Mr. DOWNEY. Mr. President, it seems to me that the arguments which have been presented in the Senate and before committees, and likewise in newspaper editorials, have proceeded upon somewhat of a misconception, on the assumption that the pending measure, if it shall become a law, will operate to a great extent among the employed young men of the Nation.

It has been argued by certain of the proponents of the measure that it is a democratic proposal because it will draft from all classes without regard to their status. Able arguments have been made pointing out the injury to an employed man who may be taken away from his work for a period of a year; but it is my opinion that we should realistically face the fact that the way the measure will work out, whether it be for good or evil, will be to select 75 or 80 percent of the trainees from among our unemployed, and at the end of their service will return them to a jobless world, their condition more desperate and unhappy than even before.

Why do I make the statement that the bill, if it should become a law, would probably take an overwhelming proportion from among the unemployed? In the first place, Mr. President, there is a far greater proportion of our unemployed among the young men of the Nation who have come out into the industrial world since 1929 than among any other group of our citizens. The most conservative figures in relation to the frustrated, jobless youth of our country are so discouraging and appalling that we no longer have the courage to state and face the facts.

I wish to read a statement showing the number of unemployed among our young people, not from any liberal, communistic, or visionary organization. What I am about to read comes from Fortune magazine, a publication which retails to the successful of the world at a dollar a copy, The authority for the statement in Fortune is an organization endowed by Rockefeller money. So the figures I shall give are not my figures or those of any radical group but proceed from a conservative authority. This is what appears in Fortune magazine for May 1940:

Statistics tell a gloomy enough tale of youth, no matter what the agency that gathers them. According to D. L. Harley, of the American Youth Commission, there were in November 1937 some 3,900,000 young people in the 15–24 age group who were out of school, actively seeking work and, save for a half million in emergency employment, entirely without jobs.

This figure, which accounts for a third to a half of our total unemployment, is bad enough, but it does not include what Mr. Harley estimates as one and a half million youths employed in part-time jobs, or a half million presumably anxious to be doing something but not actively on the labor market.

Mr. TAFT. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. DOWNEY. I yield.

Mr. TAFT. I obtained figures from Mr. Hanna, chief of editorial research of the Bureau of Labor Statistics, which seem to contradict or are very different from those presented by the Senator. Roughly speaking, of the 11,300,000 between the ages of 21 and 31, who are to be registered, these figures show that the number fully employed is about 8,700,000, and that the total entirely unemployed is only 1,600,000. There are about 1,000,000 in part-time employment. Those figures do not seem to be in accord with the figures presented by the Senator from California.

Mr. DOWNEY. No; and I may say that I am sure that the figures the Senator has given, which I heard him recite yesterday, are totally erroneous and out of line with any authority I know of.

Mr. TAFT. I obtained them from the Bureau of Labor Statistics. They are based on the Biggers unemployment census, which was taken 2 years ago, and which I think is generally accepted as the best census of unemployment in the United States.

Mr. DOWNEY. I will say to the distinguished Senator from Ohio that I was not by any implication criticizing him. I have had no opportunity to examine that authority. I know nothing about those figures. I have personally polled many high-school graduating classes; and the condition of large numbers of high-school graduates out in the world for 2, 3, 4, or 5 years is literally appalling.

Mr. TAFT. I do not mean to say that the situation is not serious. It is; but I do not think unemployment among the younger group, under the age of 30, is any worse than it is in the group over 30, or that the percentage is any higher. I say that the figures of the unemployment census and of the Bureau of Labor Statistics are infinitely better authority than Fortune magazine and that there can be no comparison between the two.

Mr. DOWNEY. Let me say to the distinguished Senator that I can present other authorities to the same effect, showing even a more desperate condition. I feel confident that the statement the Senator has read is an understatement. Mr. President, I am confident that there is a very heavy percentage of idleness among the men who came into industry since the depression. I think the distinguished Senator from Ohio should realize that that would have to be true. We have been in a critical condition since 1929. Should we not expect the older men who are beginning to lose their efficiency and the younger men who entered work after the depression began to be the principal ones to feel the ravages of unemployment? I can produce several authorities to verify that statement for the distinguished Senator from Ohio if he so desires.

Mr. TAFT. One complaint is that men over 40 have great difficulty in obtaining employment. I think the Senator will find from the figures that perhaps the percentage of unemployment among boys during the first year out of high school is high; but after that it is approximately the same among the young and the older age groups.

Mr. DOWNEY. Mr. President, regardless of which set of figures is accurate, I now desire to point out to the Senate the fact that necessarily there is a close correlation between unemployment and lack of dependents. A man who is employed, of course, is much more likely to have a wife and children to support than is the young man who has never been able to get a job. Consequently, I think we may safely assume that a large proportion of the men who will be exempted because they have dependents will be employed men, and that the men who are unemployed will not have dependents and therefore will not be exempted.

Mr. President, regardless of the two prior facts, I ask Senators to put themselves in the position of the draft boards which will be sitting in thousands of cities and towns of this Nation, where they will have the right to select from an eligible list those who shall be exempted and those who shall go into the training corps. Let us assume that the draft board in a town of 5,000 has 100 names of young men of that community presented to it. Let us assume that one-half of those are unemployed and one-half employed. Is there any doubt as to what that draft board will do in making exemptions? Will not the draft board say, "Why should we take this man out of a utility or from a farm or factory for a year when he is already engaged in work, when we have another young man who has no work at all, and who will be able to receive training and wages if he goes into the training camp?"

Mr. President, do we not know what many employers of young men in that town would say to the draft board? Would they not say, "We have spent a year or 5 years in training this young man; exempt him; take the young man who is unemployed, who may be dependent upon his parents, who may be a burden upon someone."

Mr. President, we should realistically face the fact that the pending measure would select an overwhelming proportion from among the unemployed men of the Nation. I venture to prophesy that, if the bill becomes a law and goes into effect, a year from now the figures will indubitably show that 75 or 80 percent of the men selected and placed in the training camps were selected from the jobless class or from the partially employed.

Mr. JOHNSON of Colorado. Mr. President——

Mr. DOWNEY. I yield.

Mr. JOHNSON of Colorado. Is that not exactly what the bill attempts to do? That is as I understand it.

Mr. DOWNEY. Yes. I regret that the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. BURKE], the chief proponent of this measure, is not present. He and other advocates of the measure admitted to me that the proposed measure would work out not to disrupt employment or to devastate the lives of the boys and men who have jobs, but to assist the unemployed to find employment by selecting them for the training camps.

Mr. WHEELER. Mr. President——

Mr. DOWNEY. I yield to the Senator from Montana.

Mr. WHEELER. I have heretofore quoted from the testimony of General Shedd. General Shedd said that what the Army wanted to do was to take the unimportant man, and that it would, of course, not take the important man. Then I referred to the fact that in the last draft the boards were instructed to take the farm worker, the jobless, and the man who lived on his wife and who habitually beat up his wife—perhaps that is not accurate—but, at any rate, they were taking them exactly from that class.

I should like, if the Senator will permit me, to read a statement which appeared in the newspaper last night. It reads:

> College students of the Nation were advised by President Roosevelt yesterday to continue their studies as a patriotic duty rather than enlist prematurely in the armed services or find work in the defense industries.
> The President's views were made public at the White House yesterday in the form of a reply to a memorandum from Paul V. McNutt in which the Federal Security Administrator reported that universities faced a serious problem because students were dropping out for patriotic reasons.
> "Young people should be advised," Mr. Roosevelt wrote, "that it is their patriotic duty to continue the normal course of their education unless and until they are called so that they will be well prepared for greatest usefulness to their country.
> "They will be promptly notified if they are needed for other patriotic services."

In other words, it seems to me that the President by this statement, basing it upon what Mr. McNutt told him, is saying to the young man who has money enough to go to college, "Do not enlist; go to college." What will the young man who has not enough money to go to college say? And if the boy who has enough money to go to college, or whose parents have enough money to send him to college, is to be exempted, what will the young man say who has not money enough? He will say, "I am going to be taken; I am going to have to go in the Army for $21 a month, but the boy whose father has enough money to send him to college is going to be exempted because it is his patriotic duty to go to college." If that is what it is intended to do, then the bill ought to exempt not only all college students but those who are about to enter college.

Mr. DOWNEY. I agree entirely with the statement of fact and the conclusion of opinion of the Senator from Montana. I think the way this proposed law is expected to work out by those who will administer it is that boys in the universities will not be disturbed in their college careers. I am very certain such assurance has already been given to the educational leaders of this Nation.

Let me say that I can see a degree of reasonableness in such a plan. I can understand in the case of a large group of young men who have no work, who are earning no money, who are dependent upon relatives, that someone could reasonably say, "Well, we are merely helping them by giving them a year of training with some small wages besides. Why let them continue jobless while we disrupt the life of the employed person?" I can see the logic of that; but, Mr. President, let us examine the other side of the shield.

We here in America are using the words "freedom and democracy" very loosely. We love to substitute noble platitudes for realism. Let us not talk about freedom and democracy, splendid as those words are, for the moment; let us talk about jobs and security and the right of a young man to have the opportunity of a marriage and a home.

It is my opinion that most of the young men who are now jobless, however many there are—and I believe there are millions of them—have honestly and energetically sought to find work. I have come in contact with hundreds of them begging only the right to an honest, decent job. Oh, I know, Mr. President, they are not our sons; they are not the sons of our friends. That group can find jobs all right; and that is one reason why so many officials here in Washington, insulated against the realism of this desperate world, do not know the bitterness and the frustration of the young man who leaves high school or college honestly wanting the right to work, but is denied the simple right to toil with his hands or with his head.

Mr. BONE. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. DOWNEY. I yield.

Mr. BONE. On that point I read a story in the newspapers yesterday relating to the testimony, which is not available as yet for I understand it has not been printed, of Colonel Knox, against whose confirmation to be Secretary of the Navy I voted. In testifying before the House committee he said:

The generation which has grown up since the World War—

That is, the youngsters of the present day—

never understood the responsibility that was theirs in a democracy.

Of course, they have had very little opportunity to understand economic responsibility, since millions of them have had no jobs. Proceeding further, Colonel Knox said that these boys have led "an entirely abnormal life."

One reason for the failure of many democracies has been the softness of fiber of its youth because they had not been called upon for sacrifice.

I will say to the Senator from California that I have letters in my office—and I think perhaps it is the common experience of all Senators—not by dozens but by hundreds, from young men who have vainly sought for the opportunity to get jobs.

Mr. DOWNEY. I thank the distinguished Senator for his statement, with which I wholeheartedly agree. I proclaim now that the boys and girls of this generation are just as fine physical and mental specimens as their fathers and their grandfathers were. There is only one thing they lack—and that is the opportunity to work at a decent wage under existing conditions that will give them security and the right to a marriage and a home.

Of course, Mr. President, if Colonel Knox and the others of us permit a world to exist in which men are thrown upon W. P. A. or relief or into the ranks of idleness for years, our people will become softened and broken and devastated. No man can endure insecurity and break-down of morale for 2 or 3 years, with the frustration that springs from not having a place in the world and a job. No man can endure that sort of thing for any long period—not one within the sound of my voice or anyone else within the United States.

Of course, the W. P. A. worker may become slack; of course, the man on relief ceases to be a normal citizen; of course, the boy denied the opportunity to do something and have his place becomes, perhaps, lazy and soft; but it is not his fault; it is the fault of the leaders of a desperately unhappy civilization who are unwilling to make the effort to open opportunities for work and careers for young men.

I should not, perhaps, speak of myself, but when I was a boy I found many jobs always open to me. Perhaps they involved hard work and small pay, but they meant security and opportunity to have a place in the world. I speak from personal investigation when I say we live in a totally different world today.

So I say to you, Mr. President, if we are going to take the unemployed youth of the Nation into training camps to make them the first line of defense, let us be realistic about it and examine and face the problem and see what we should do about it.

In the first place, Mr. President, I wonder what kind of a soldier we are going to have when we draft a boy out of idleness and the frustration and bitterness that must be in his heart and say to him, "You must take military training for a year, and if a war comes your body and your life will be at the command of your military leaders, liable to mutilation and destruction." I wonder what that young man is going to think. Is he going to believe this society of ours is worth fighting for? Is he going to make a good soldier? I do not know. One person's opinion on these questions is as good as another's. But I have said to the General Staff and I have said to the Military Affairs Committee, "It seems to me we ought to reexamine and reappraise this proposition. If we are going to go to the jobless youth of America to find our Army, what kind of an Army is that type of material going to make if war comes, if our soldiers have to risk their safety and their lives to defend this society of ours, with its idleness, slums, degradation, and poverty? Should we not carefully consider what kind of soldiers we will have if we select them from the jobless classes of the Nation?

Mr. President, I am firmly of the opinion that a decent, persuasive appeal could be made to the unemployed of America for voluntary enlistment in military training if some recognition of their problems were made and some hope offered them—not platitudes, but concrete realities. That is the reason why I have introduced this bill, so that, if enacted, the President of the United States could say to the young men who may go into our training camps, "You are a citizen of this country. We have not dealt very well with you in the past, but now we are going to call upon you for a dangerous obligation of citizenship. We are going to begin to prepare you as a soldier, possibly to fight in desperate defense of your Nation.

"But we guarantee we are assuming a correlative duty or obligation on the part of our sovereign Government. We are going to ask military service of you, but we are going to provide you with the guaranteed opportunity to work, so that when you come out of a training camp or out of a war, you will know you will have the chance to work at decent wages, create a home, marry, and carve out your own destiny in a constructive living world, instead of living in a world of unemployment, depression, and decay."

I am satisfied, Mr. President, that if the Chief Executive of the United States should appeal to the unemployed youth of the Nation upon that basis they would respond with enthusiasm, loyalty, and courage; and there would pour into the ranks of our training camps every month far more men than our Army would be able to train and equip.

But, Mr. President, my amendment to the pending bill goes far beyond the guaranty of a right to the young man who has been given military training. It would establish in this Nation a new and fundamental right for every citizen. It would write into the basic laws of our country a new obligation of society toward its citizens—the duty of society to provide the opportunity for work for every American.

Yes, Mr. President, in this wealthy, complicated technological civilization two new rights must be established—the right of the retired worker to sufficient social dividends to live in security and peace and the right of the employables of the Nation to have the opportunity to work at just and decent wage.

Mr. President, I shall later attempt to show, by the opinion of Army experts, that the North American continent, with reasonable military defense, is invulnerable to any kind of attack from nations 5,000 and 10,000 miles away. I am not urging that we should not prepare. Of course, we ought to get the finest air force and Navy and the finest Army that we need, and get them as rapidly as possible. We should have started on this program 2 or 3 years ago; but we have started in plenty of time. By this time next year we shall have 15,000 planes, among the best in the world, and, I think, the finest pilots in the world to fly them; and in the face of that power, joined with a reasonable Army and our great Navy, not a single enemy transport would ever even dare to leave Asiatic or European shores to attempt our conquest. Not one transport can be landed on the American continent in the face of a superior air force; and by next April, if Japan or Germany should be insane enough to send across the Atlantic or the Pacific some great transport armada, it would be destroyed by our Navy or air force before it ever even reached our coast line; and when I say that I am saying what every military expert will verify, so far as I know.

Nevertheless, Mr. President, I am a supreme pessimist. I do not think we stand in any danger of being conquered by the Mikado or Hitler; but let us proceed for a few years longer increasing public debts without creating corresponding assets, let us wait until this armament boom has ended, and then, indeed, we shall face an abyss of unemployment which should terrify the strongest heart. I say to you without fear of contradiction that if, for the next 10 years, we proceed without any recognition of our fundamental problems and without any attempt to master them, as we have for the past 10 years, this society, this Government, this civilization of ours will crash just as surely as we are standing here today; and doubt it not.

Is one thought being given by our governmental leaders to what will happen 2 or 3 or 4 years from now, when we have sixty or seventy-five or eighty-five or one hundred billion dollars of debt, and this crisis is past? Is any consideration being given to any domestic problems? I say "No"; every concern for our internal welfare is blotted out by the hysterical fright that some enemy may sweep in here on some "blitzkrieg" from thousands of miles away to devastate this Nation.

Mr. President, I wish that I could reassure the American people by voicing to them what are commonly known facts. Consider that we here in North America have double the population of Germany. Yes, in Canada, the United States, and Mexico there are two persons for every one in Germany. And that means if the necessity ever arose that the people of North America could mobilize twice Germany's military power. And we have far richer factory capacity, far greater natural resources, just as great chemical, technical, and engineering skill. Yet many of our people tremble at the thought that the Germanic nation may transport military power 5,000 or 10,000 miles, and construct some sort of a base somewhere in this hemisphere and thereafter successfully invade our territory.

Mr. President, for years we have been building bases at the Panama Canal and in the Caribbean. By next April we will be able to mass there a Navy, airplanes, and an Army, which could devastate any force Germany could ever build in the New World. For military experts say that when soldiers and material are transported 5,000 miles, a handicap is taken 5 or 10 times over.

I shall not argue that proposition further today because I have consistently supported adequate military defense. I shall only pray that our governmental leaders shall realize the peril of the economic crisis which began in 1929, and is just as severe today as ever, save for a temporary armament boom.

Mr. WHEELER. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. DOWNEY. I yield.

Mr. WHEELER. I wish to call the attention of the Senator to the fact that in 1923 there was the same unemployment in Germany and the same disorganization, except to a greater extent, that we have in this country today. They entered upon an armament program there for the purpose of alleviating the unemployment situation, and that led them to dictatorship. They had conscription, they had everything that is now proposed here, and they built up a great army, which led them definitely into positive totalitarianism. We are turning away from our home problems. I thoroughly agree with what the Senator says with reference to solving the unemployment question in the United States. I agree with him entirely that if we do not solve it, if we go on building up military armaments, we will go the same way all the other countries have gone.

Mr. DOWNEY. I wholly agree with the Senator from Montana, save for one qualification: Our wealth and manpower are so tremendous that for us to equal the military might of Germany or to carry out our present plans is not going to absorb a large part of our manpower or wealth in a war economy. I grant just what the Senator says, that we are now going the self-same way Europe went; but I do not agree that over any extended period we can build enough battleships or airplanes or munition factories to employ a substantial number of our now idle people.

Let us examine some figures. One of the largest items our Army has to acquire, next to airplanes, is trucks. Perhaps for a great Army we might require a hundred thousand additional units. Well, it may be thought that building a hundred thousand trucks would be a heavy burden on our economy. Let us see.

General Motors alone has a present production of 200,000 trucks a year, and Mr. Sloan has assured us that his company alone has an unused capacity of 50,000 trucks every year beyond that 200,000. Yes; the unused truck capacity of the United States, including General Motors and other manufacturers, in 1 year could produce 100,000 trucks to further motorize our Army. It may be thought that that would produce substantial employment. Not so, for it would not require the building of one factory machine; it would require the employment of only a few thousand more workers in the automobile industry.

Mr. President, there is one item of manufacture which temporarily will result in the employment of a substantial number of men, and that is the airplane industry. But the experts tell us that when the factories are built the production of 2,000 airplanes a month will result in the employment of approximately 300,000 workers in the airplane industry, in the manufacture of both the bodies and the engines, and perhaps 200,000 more in subsidiary industries.

After our munition and airplane factories are once built, and that probably will be accomplished within less than 2 years, I doubt that the production of our military equipment will result in the employment of more than a million workers a year. Let us assume we throw into our military forces another million and a half American boys beyond what we have now. That would mean that, looking ahead 2 years, there would be two and a half million of additional manpower employed in military uses.

Yearly we have 1,250,000 boys, becoming 21 years of age, flowing out into a supersaturated labor market. Probably at the height of the armament boom unemployment will not drop below seven or eight millions.

We have another factor to consider. In the last 10 years millions of industrial workers have left the great cities, because they could not get factory jobs, going back to marginal farm lands, back to rural employment, or to live with the home folks. The Department of Commerce estimates that that reservoir of potential idleness comprises millions of men. Perhaps my colleagues have noticed the census reports to the effect that, outside of New York and Los Angeles and Houston, Tex., hardly a great city in the United States gained in population in the last 10 years, and many of them lost substantially. The great cities lost because of the breakdown of factory employment, the discharge of millions of workers there, and their return to rural regions. Already the optimistic headlines about armament jobs are luring the men from the farms back to cities expecting to find jobs in military industries. This flow of men from rural to metropolitan centers will substantially augment the active idle army.

We now hope to end unemployment by armament manufacture, but our manpower, our wealth, our factory capacity is so tremendous that to support a great Army and Navy and airplane force will absorb only a few million of our youth and our idle, leaving us with an appalling problem unsolved.

Mr. BONE. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. GURNEY in the chair). Does the Senator from California yield to the Senator from Washington?

Mr. DOWNEY. I yield.

Mr. BONE. I am sure the Senator from California is familiar with the writings of Oswald Spengler, concerning whom it is said that he was the greatest philosopher of our time. He pointed out a number of years ago, I believe in his work Man and Technics, that the supreme and overwhelming tragedy of this era was that the labor of human beings was becoming unwanted; that technological change was thrusting us into an era of such violent, rough change that the transition would probably overwhelm us if we were not very careful.

I am constrained in some degree to agree entirely with his thesis, because today a man, by the aid of labor-saving machinery, can produce 50 times what his grandsire could produce. The result of all this is merely to complicate his problems and to make his life more tragic for him.

But speaking of the eastern viewpoint, which comes from being cloistered and sheltered, I would call the Senate's attention to "a gem of purest ray serene" appearing today in an editorial published in an eastern newspaper printed in New York. It said that if Congress fooled around with voluntary recruiting experiments or "jacked up the Army pay from $21 to $30, it would be only with the hope of luring a lot of fortune hunters into the Army."

Mr. President, I think a statement of that kind is the supreme tragedy, and certainly an ironical commentary on present-day conditions in beautiful America. The thought that would find expression in the editorial of a great newspaper that boys who saw an opportunity to get the difference between $21 and $30 a month would rush into the Army as fortune hunters is about as bad a contemplation of current American life as I have ever seen in print.

Mr. WHEELER. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. DOWNEY. I yield.

Mr. WHEELER. That editorial was also published in a Washington newspaper, the morning Times-Herald, was it not?

Mr. BONE. It was.

Mr. WHEELER. Both these newspapers, the Washington Times-Herald and the New York newspaper to which the Senator referred, in their editorial policies have been very strong advocates of conscription, but when it was sought to raise the pay in the Army from $21 to $30 they urged that that not be done because "a lot of fortune hunters" would want to get into the Army.

Mr. DOWNEY. Mr. President, I was delighted to learn from the statement made by the junior Senator from Nebraska [Mr. BURKE] yesterday that the bill originally embodied a provision for $5 a month pay, merely as a sort of a gesture or joke. I happen to have been on the Senate Military Affairs Committee when that question was first discussed, and I expressed my feeling of shock that any civilized society would want to draft men at $5 a month. Some of the proponents of the measure I believe went so far as to intimate that it was a cowardly suggestion that men should want money to defend their Nation. I think certain persons even went so far as to intimate that I was guilty of cowardly conduct in suggesting that we ought to attempt to pay to our young men going into military service somewhat the same wages that would be received for similar work in civil life.

Mr. JOHNSON of Colorado. The Senator will recall that one of the witnesses who was advocating the $5 a month pay made the statement to the Senator, when he complained about the smallness of the wage, "You cannot put a price on patriotism."

Mr. DOWNEY. Yes; I recall that very distinctly now that the Senator from Colorado has mentioned it. I am glad to learn that the proponents of the measure did not intend ultimately to restrict the pay of those who would be conscripted to that sum of $5 a month, and I am happy indeed to have the word of the junior Senator from Nebraska for that fact.

Mr. President, perhaps some Senators have been considering that we must not only produce military equipment for our Army but that we will also have to produce their food, clothing, and shelter.

The burden of such support should not alarm us. I can assure them that in the State of California we waste or destroy so much farm produce every year that we alone could provide all the food for all the military forces of the United States, plus the workers who are producing munitions for them, in addition to what we now market. Yes; and easily we could provide the food beyond that for the ten or fifteen million young people in the United States now destined to poor teeth and weak bones and invalidism because they simply do not have enough to eat. I am not attaching any particular importance to California when I say that. The State of Texas and several other States likewise could produce all the farm products beyond what it now sells to supply all the needs I have mentioned.

Clothing, you say? Why, the great factories of New England and the Atlantic Coast States, by speeding up a minor percent of their unused capacity, could produce all the clothing that our military forces will require.

The truth is, However much we may develop a war economy, how many boys we may conscript, how many airplanes and how large a navy we may build, it will not solve the question of unemployment.

Mr. President, in 1929 we saw the primary economic crisis develop that now engulfs the Nation. About a year ago we were thrown into a secondary crisis by this war. Before we had ever even begun to understand the depression of 1929, the war threat now frightens and confuses us.

Mr. President, I should like to present the possibility of a third crisis that may soon confront us in the hope that American leaders will awaken to the desperate conditions which may engulf us in the next 3 or 4 years. I shall read from the New York Times, quoting one of our greatest chemists. I wish to say that, while this article was printed some 2 months ago, I understand subsequent discoveries show that the development indicated in this article is more rapidly taking place than suggested in the article.

I shall read only a short portion of the article, but I ask that the article in full be printed in the RECORD at the conclusion of my speech.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

(See exhibit A.)

Mr. DOWNEY. I read as follows from this article:

A natural substance found abundantly in many parts of the earth, now separated for the first time in pure form, has been found in pioneer experiments at the physics department of Columbia University to be capable of yielding such energy that 1 pound of it is equal in power output to 5,000,000 pounds of coal or 3,000,000 pounds of gasoline, it became known yesterday.

The discovery was announced in the current issue of the Physical Review, official publication of American physicists and one of the leading scientific journals of its kind in the world.

Prof. John R. Dunning, Columbia physicist, who headed the scientific team whose research led to the experimental proof of the vast power in the newly isolated substance, told a colleague, it was learned, that improvement in the methods of extraction of the substance was the only step that remained to be solved for its introduction as a new source of power. Other leading physicists agreed with him.

A chunk of 5 to 10 pounds of the new substance, a close relative of uranium and known as U–235, would drive an ocean liner or an oceangoing submarine for an indefinite period around the oceans of the world without refueling, it was said, for such a chunk would possess the power output of 25,000,000 to 50,000,000 pounds of coal or of 15,000,000 to 30,000,000 pounds of gasoline.

Mr. President, many of the greatest chemists in the world now anticipate that within less than 5 years the secret of atomic energy will be ours. Chemists in Germany have probably gone further than ours in this development. Many of their greatest chemists are developing this new form of energy.

For the past 50 years scientists have foreseen the possibilities of the endless and cheap power which might flow from atomic energy. Within the past year the final discovery has been made, and if its commercial use becomes an accomplished fact—as conservative scientists of the world now say it will—we shall see the end of the petroleum industry, the coal industry, the utility industry, and many others. We shall again see the face of the earth changed, just as radio, airplanes, and fast transportation have changed it in the past 25 years.

American businessmen have suggested that any form of energy which could be produced so cheaply, and which would destroy great segments of our present businesses, should be suppressed by the Government. But alas, Mr. President, the chemists of the totalitarian States are working night and day to perfect this new form of energy, and if we lag behind them in the development of that great new source of energy the results to American civilization may be calamitous indeed.

So I say, Mr. President, that the governmental leaders in America had better lift their vision beyond the immediate emergency of airplanes, navies, and conscription—important as they are—to an understanding of what may happen in this Nation 2 or 3 or 5 years from now.

Perhaps some Senators are wondering what the possibility of atomic energy has to do with the discussion of the pending measure. I answer that question by saying that we had better speedily initiate the right of universal and total employment before it is too late. In other words, if atomic energy should destroy certain industries and bring cheap and unlimited power and greater wealth to us, society as a whole would have nothing to be distressed about so long as we provide the opportunity for work for all our citizens. But if we are to continue to operate our industries and farms at about 60 percent of capacity, when we tremendously increase the present capacity disaster will indeed lie ahead of us.

Mr. President, it seems to me that for the next 10 years we have one method of satisfactorily, efficiently, and completely employing all our otherwise unemployed.

Mr. ASHURST. Mr. President, will the Senator yield to me for the purpose of suggesting the absence of a quorum?

Mr. DOWNEY. I yield.

Mr. ASHURST. I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The clerk will call the roll.

The Chief Clerk called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Eight-seven Senators having answered to their names, a quorum is present.

Mr. DOWNEY. Mr. President, governmental statistics indicated a few months ago that there were approximately ten or eleven million unemployed in the Nation. I believe the present information from governmental bureaus is that our army of unemployed has dropped down approximately to 9,000,000. I have endeavored to show in the preceding part of my address that at the height of the armament boom which is now on its way we will have in the neighborhood of six or seven million unemployed, and that when we have once built the factories and laid in the vast supply of war material which is contemplated, and the war crisis passes, as pass it will sooner or later, we will then have a segment of our workers unemployed beyond any figures I desire to suggest.

Mr. President, I say that we have at least one great job in this Nation that ought to be done, one great job that could be made self-liquidating, one great investment to which none of our citizens would object, because it would trespass not at all upon private industry. I refer now to the employment of our idle machines and manpower in the construction of a great system of superhighways.

Mr. President, as we contemplate the spectacle of this Nation with dangerous, defective, inefficient highways, upon which twenty-five or thirty thousand people are needlessly killed every year and a million seriously injured, as we contemplate the saturation and delay and disadvantages of our traffic, with millions upon millions of men begging to do work, we must wonder whether while we are still an adolescent Nation we have not become old and tired.

I have talked with contractors and builders who have verified the statistics from the Department of Commerce and my own observation. What are those statistics? In the United States, in the first place, we have literally thousands of sand plants, gravel plants, and cement plants, which generally are working at from 25- to 50-percent capacity. I know, from personal investigation, that arcund many of these plants—and I believe the statement applies to all of them—are scores or hundreds of families whose chief bread winner is desperately anxious to work in those road-construction plants. We find destitute, desperate, hungry families around most of them, many of the workers on W. P. A., earning $50 or $60 a month and trying to support families on that meager amount; we find the part-time employee working a quarter or half his time; we find totally idle men, women, and children, on precarious and desperate relief.

Yes, Mr. President; the contractors of the Nation tell me we have plenty of capacity and manpower in our sand, gravel, and cement plants to begin the reconstruction and rebuilding of the highways of America so that they will be fast, efficient, commodious, and safe, and a great asset to our military authorities in time of war and to our commerce in time of peace.

Mr. President, in every State in the Union we have many blueprints of highways already surveyed strategically needed, which the citizens of every city and State would delight to have. As a matter of fact, if we had the energy and courage to undertake this task, we could begin to let contracts within 90 days.

I want to pay tribute to the different highway commissions of the States of the United States. Most of the engineers and men on those commissions are men of the highest ability and patriotism. For 30 years now we have been learning how to build modern superhighways, and we are now ready to undertake the task of rebuilding the country's roads.

Many of our traffic experts say that investment in roads is the best investment from a money viewpoint which has ever been offered to any people.

The contractors of the Nation with whom I have consulted have told me that there are at least 4,000,000 to 5,000,000 unskilled laborers in the United States who, without trenching upon our armament program, are ready, able, and willing to start this great job of rebuilding the Nation; and in almost every great city there are gigantic road-building machines idle, ready to tear the face of the United States apart along its highways and rebuild those highways in modern, efficient form. As a matter of fact, I do not know of one alibi or excuse—not one—that could be offered by an intelligent people for not undertaking this job. Do we want to continue to kill and maim people? Do we want to continue to make automobile traffic a nightmare? Looking ahead 20 years, do we want all traffic to break down in our cities? Do we want to handicap our military authorities in the event of war? Would we prefer to have these men idle rather than producing for us?

I cannot conceive of a single argument that any rational governmental leader can make against a vast system of superhighway building. On the other hand, I can give to the Senate reason after reason which should convince everyone that it is our vital duty to undertake this task.

I happen to notice in the gallery of the Senate one of the most distinguished judges California has ever had. I only wish this issue could be tried out as I have tried cases before him, before a judge and jury who would intelligently and patiently sit there, consider the facts in the problem, and then register a verdict. I can express unbounded confidence that in that case the jury would bring in its verdict without ever even leaving the box.

Mr. ASHURST. Mr. President, the able Senator from California advises us that in the gallery of the Senate Chamber there is sitting one of the most distinguished jurists of the State of California. Would the Senator object to giving his name?

Mr. DOWNEY. The Honorable Peter J. Shields, of Sacramento, before whom I have tried many cases, and who is recognized by the bar of our State as one of the distinguished and outstanding judges of the West.

Mr. ASHURST. Mr. President, will the Senator further yield to me?

Mr. DOWNEY. I yield.

Mr. ASHURST. More than 25 years ago I happened to be at a banquet in San Francisco—and those who know me know how much I love post-prandial oratory, and how often

I attempt it. Judge Peter Shields, to whom the able Senator refers, happened to be one of the speakers that night, and his speech so impressed me that after the lapse of 25 years I am able to repeat it, but I shall not do so now.

Mr. DOWNEY. We should be delighted indeed to have the distinguished Senator from Arizona repeat it.

Mr. President, we here, operating as a democracy, have tremendous difficulty in the presentation or consideration of any governmental issues, however vital they may be to our people. I desire to say that at least during the time I have been in the Senate of the United States I have yet to see us earnestly and intelligently and realistically face this devastating problem of a collapsing economy and our great army of unemployment; but I predict that the day will not be far distant when we shall address ourselves solemnly to that issue, or it may well be too late.

Mr. President, I was recently speaking to a group of bankers at No. 1 Wall Street on the question of superhighways. I stated to that group of distinguished American financiers that the traffic experts estimated that to rebuild the highway systems of America in their best form it would take approximately $100,000,000,000. One of the bankers put his hand up to his head and said, "Oh, Senator, you mean a billion dollars, do you not?" "No; I do not mean a billion dollars." "Well, you do not mean more than $10,000,000,000?" He was shocked at the figure of $100,000,000,000. He should not have been. The peak of railroad building in America was in 1870. At that time we had only 10 percent of the national income we now have, with about one-fourth of the population. Yet, nevertheless, a virile and a courageous people invested to exceed $30,000,000,000 in our railroads, and the cost of the money to the railroads over the period of time since they were built runs from 6 to 7 percent, while the American Government now could borrow money at 2¼ percent. In other words, with 10 times the national income that we had in railroad-building days, we could now rebuild the roads of the Nation without very much greater burden to ourselves, because of lower interest rates, than that which was carried when the railroads were built; and yet apparently we are afraid to face this task and undertake it. We let machines lie idle and let men rust in despair rather than utilize their labor to destroy highway death traps and construct modern roads.

Mr. President, I suppose some of the Senators themselves are shocked by the suggestion that we might spend $100,000,000,000 on our highways. Let me state that the traffic experts estimate that $65,000,000,000 of that amount would be spent in the great cities of the United States and $35,000,000,000 in connecting the smaller towns and the great cities on superhighways across the Nation. If you go into the saturated business district of almost any great city in the United States you will find traffic problems and traffic snarls which are devastating to our pocketbooks and to our nerves. In many of the great cities, in the heavy business districts where the great traffic of the Nation proceeds, we do not average over 7 or 8 miles an hour.

We hardly get as much speed with modern automotive units on the streets of cities as our grandfathers got with horse and buggy. I live out in Chevy Chase, 9 miles from this Capitol. When I take a bus and am crowded in with tired, hungry, perspiring people, who are packed in like a bunch of sardines, sometimes in a 9-mile trip we do not average 6 miles an hour over the 9 miles. It takes sometimes over an hour and a half to travel that 9 miles from the Capitol to Chevy Chase.

Modern highway builders could construct a superhighway to every outlying district of Washington so that we could leave a downtown point and travel with safety out to the suburbs at the rate of 40 or 50 or even 60 miles an hour without endangering anyone's safety. By removing out of the streets that great flow of traffic which goes to the suburban areas, we could double the speed of traffic, or at least materially speed up the traffic in the downtown business section.

The traffic engineers say that we now have about 30,000,000 automotive units operating on our highways. It is estimated that within 20 years those will increase to 40,000,000. We now travel about 250,000,000,000 vehicle miles a year. It is estimated that within 20 years we will travel double that, at the present rate of increase, or travel 500,000,000,000 miles annually.

In certain figures which I will give to the Senate shortly I have assumed an average vehicular travel for the next 40 years of 400,000,000,000 miles a year. To simplify that, I might say it represents 40,000,000 automobiles traveling an average of 10,000 miles a year, because 10,000 times 40,000,000 is 400,000,000,000.

I have talked with experts in many of the great cities of the United States, and while they differ materially as to what they believe to be the average speed of vehicular traffic in the United States, they are all pretty well agreed that modern efficient highways would double the average vehicular speed in the United States.

In order to show the tremendous money saving which would come to our people from efficient highways, I have prepared the chart I have here on the wall of the Senate. In this chart I have used the most conservative figures that were offered to me by the traffic experts, those most against my argument.

The legend on this chart reads:

Estimated United States auto traffic.
Annual average 1940 to 1980.
Four hundred billion vehicle-miles yearly.
Present average automobile speed: Twenty miles per hour.
Possible average automobile speed: Forty miles per hour.
Modern highways would save 10,000,000,000 vehicle-hours yearly.
Annual money saving in time alone by modern highways.
Ten billion vehicle-hours, at 60 cents per hour, $6,000,000,000 annually.

Mr. President, those are the most conservative figures, and the traffic experts are generally agreed that the greatest investment ever offered any people is in a modern highway system.

The great superhighway from Pittsburgh to Harrisburg is soon to be opened. The saving that will come to trucks and automobiles, beyond the toll they will be compelled to pay, indicates that that investment, from a social viewpoint, will yield rich returns indeed.

I will ask my colleagues to consider the matter themselves. On a good superhighway system one could travel to the outlying districts of this city, 10 miles from this building, in 15 or 20 minutes, whereas it now takes 35 or 40 minutes. Figure yourselves the value of the time that would be saved and remember over 60 percent of the vehicular traffic of America is commercial traffic. The engineers tell me that in allowing 60 cents an hour as the value of vehicular traffic, that is a most conservative figure indeed.

But, Mr. President, let us disregard that for a moment. Do Senators know how much money the traffic experts say will be lost on account of automobile collisions in the next 40 years? With present highways, it will run to about $2,500,000,000 a year.

During the last calendar year the money loss because of death and injury and destruction of property on highways through collisions amounted to more than a billion and a half. Over 30,000 people were killed and over a million were injured. The money loss arising from those collisions would almost pay the total interest charge upon an investment which would largely make those collisions absolutely impossible.

To those of my colleagues who may wonder if modern highways would do away with the possibility of collisions, I may say that on efficient superhighways already constructed, accidents are largely reduced because collisions cannot occur. Let us see why that is true.

On a good highway there are not two roads crossing over each other at grade. About 20 percent of the accidents come from collisions of two cars traveling at right angles to each other. If one car has to go over or under the other, there is no longer the possibility of that type of accident.

Another very common cause of accident is collision between automobiles traveling in the opposite direction. Under the modern highway system that just cannot occur, because there is a medial line of parking down the center which divides approaching streams of traffic, so that head-on collisions are not possible.

Then, under the modern highway system the pedestrian is not allowed to be on the right-hand side of the road, or cars parked there, or any other object or person there with which a car can collide.

Mr. President, that leaves just one major kind of accident possible, and that is a rear-end collision, or sideswipe of cars going in the same direction when one is attempting to pass the other. The great proportion of that kind of accidents occur on narrow, winding, improperly graded roads, and when two or three broad lanes of traffic are built, that type of collision becomes much rarer.

Engineers in California took some of the most dangerous places in our highway systems, watched them for 2 or 3 years, and then proceeded to build superhighways, and the accidents almost passed out of the picture.

I desire to say to the distinguished junior Senator from New York [Mr. MEAD], who does me the honor to listen to what I am saying, that Dr. Miller McClintock, one of the noted experts, says that on the modern highways now being built in New York City, the accident rate has been reduced to a minimum, and anyone who has traveled upon those fine new highways realizes how very safe highways may become.

At this point in my address may I divert to express my deep obligation to Dr. Miller McClintock for the valued advice and courteous assistance he has rendered me in connection with superhighway investigation.

One traffic expert said to me:

> It does not make any difference whether we build these superhighways or not; we are going to pay for them anyway, and we are going to pay far more for them if we don't build them than if we do.

And I think that statement accurately states the issue.

I suppose there is no Senator present who can look forward with any tranquility to the day when this armament boom has ended and our national debt has increased to sixty-five billion or seventy-five billion dollars. Before ever this war burden was placed upon us our annual deficit was running something over $3,000,000,000 a year, largely for unemployment relief, W. P. A., and similar projects. I suppose every Senator present will concede that for the next few years, if things continue as they are, the Federal deficits will run billions of dollars beyond that, and that we shall emerge from this crisis with the national solvency imperiled, with our banks and insurance companies loaded with Federal bonds—loaded with bonds which a collapsing economy cannot ever hope to repay.

Mr. President, if we were operating our farms and factories at full capacity, almost any burden on our great wealth would be light indeed. But with 10,000,000 persons wholly unemployed, and as many more partially employed, the day will come, unless this problem is realistically met, when national credit will fail, and with it will come the collapse of our banks and insurance companies, and what lies beyond that I have no desire to prophesy.

Perhaps certain Senators who are present are thinking, Yes; but you are suggesting a far greater debt to build our highways. Where is the distinction? I point out to them that in building our highways we are creating an asset worth many times what it costs us, an asset which in money returns alone, if you want to put it on a toll-road basis, would carry the investment and amortize the debt itself.

Assume you are a banker, and a farmer comes to you seeking to borrow money to feed his children, or to buy shotgun shells to shoot at his neighbor, you then would be confronted with a different problem than if the farmer wanted to put in some crop for which he would have a market, and from which he could make the profits that would pay off the debt.

Mr. President, I say that not only can we afford to make this investment—we cannot afford not to make it.

Mr. BYRD. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. WILEY in the chair). Does the Senator from California yield to the Senator from Virginia?

Mr. DOWNEY. I yield.

Mr. BYRD. What would be the cost of the Senator's proposed highways?

Mr. DOWNEY. I might state to the Senator from Virginia that the bill is so drawn that we would engage in such superhighway construction as would result in the total employment of all our people. Of course, the amount that we would spend and the number of years it would take to build the highway system would depend upon the number of laborers that would be otherwise employed in industry. To rebuild the whole highway system of America in finest form, according to the traffic experts, would take $100,000,000,000. At 10 years' building, that would be $10,000,000,000 a year.

I do not know whether the distinguished Senator from Virginia was present at the time I referred to the subject or not, but I pointed out that with the national income from 1850 to 1890 averaging about 10 percent what it does now, we assumed just about as great a burden, considering interest charges, in building the railroads, as would be involved in building the superhighways.

I do not know what portion of my argument the distinguished Senator has heard, but I may say to him that our noted traffic experts say that there would be a money return of very large amount upon the very finest kind of highways that we could build.

Mr. BYRD. Did I understand the Senator to say $100,000,000,000?

Mr. DOWNEY. One hundred billion dollars; that is correct.

Mr. BYRD. The Senator proposes to rebuild all the highways, not only the superhighways, but all the public roads in America?

Mr. DOWNEY. Yes; that is correct. I wish to point out that the greater amount of money would be spent in the cities, such as Washington, D. C., New York, Los Angeles, Chicago, and St. Louis, for in our cities 75 to 80 percent of the automobile traffic now occurs.

Mr. MEAD. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. DOWNEY. I yield.

Mr. MEAD. The Senator no doubt has in mind, and is motivated by a desire to utilize the Nation's idle manpower in what might be termed self-liquidating projects?

Mr. DOWNEY. That is correct.

Mr. MEAD. And he visualizes a saving in the use of the new highways over the use of the present highways, together with an increased efficiency in our Nation's economy, which would offset the cost of this particular investment?

Mr. DOWNEY. That is correct.

Mr. MEAD. In view of the fact that the Nation faces what might be termed a defense emergency, and because we have been accelerating highway traffic, and traffic by air even to the extent of subsidies on the part of the Government, does not the Senator believe that it would be beneficial, from the standpoint of the United States Government, to put the railroads of the United States in the very best possible condition, because if the railroads had the latest in railroad equipment, if they had the most efficient and most economical service and equipment, and if they had modernized roadbeds, it would not only be helpful to national defense, but it would take a large volume of traffic off the present highways of the United States?

Unless we do something for the railroads, unless we make it less difficult for them to equip the roads with modernized trains, we will divert more and more traffic to the highways, and in that way we will hurt the railroads, injuring our chances for the most efficient possible defense, and we will put a heavier burden of cost upon our Nation's highways.

I believe that in the Senator's plan some thought should be given to the modernization of our railroads. They are in bad economic and financial straits at present. If they could modernize and improve their equipment, they would lighten the load on the highways. But if they continue as at present, they will lose constantly the trade that really should be left with them.

Mr. DOWNEY. Mr. President, I am in total agreement with the distinguished Senator from New York when he states that in any solution of our transportation problem the railroads, and the railroad workers, must be taken into account, and that it would only be common sense to use them to the highest efficiency in order to relieve our transportation.

Let me say to the distinguished Senator that if he will go along on this plan to end all unemployment in the United States, he will create such a volume of prosperity through the transportation of increased numbers of passengers and freight that the railroads will immediately become highly prosperous.

In connection with this I should like to develop exactly what would happen in the event we should go into a great program of highway building. Probably not more than four or five million of our unemployed—principally unskilled workers—would be required to rebuild the highway system of America in the next 10 years. However, their wages in every community would create such added purchasing power all over the United States that full employment would result. New workers would give new business to retail merchants. The farmers would have a larger market. Dentists and doctors would have increased clientele. The motion-picture theaters, the hotels, and the railroads would have more customers.

Department of Commerce experts have stated to me that the employment of four or five million workers on highway projects would probably be sufficient to "prime the pump" so that total employment would be attained. At the present time every cotton-growing Southern State faces supreme disaster, because in all probability the cotton market of the South, heretofore found in foreign nations, is gone. Ordinarily in a normal market we in the United States have consumed about 8,000,000 bales of cotton a year. We annually try to export around four or five or six million bales; and, of course, as every Senator knows, we have had tremendous difficulty in doing that. Senators from the South tell me that a bleak future faces their people because of the failing foreign cotton market.

The distinguished senior Senator from Georgia [Mr. GEORGE], who knows much more about the cotton situation than do most of us, has told me that he believes that if the national income could be increased by 50 percent, cotton consumption in the Nation would be increased by the same amount, and that alone would immediately create prosperity in the South. We are now consuming 8,000,000 bales of cotton a year. If the American people could consume 12,000,000 bales a year, we could immediately lift our Southern States into security and prosperity.

Some Senators probably wonder how that can be done. I wonder how we can fail to do it with half our population lacking sufficient bedding, rugs, clothes, and other products of raw cotton. Of course, we can do it. If we do not do it, heaven help the South in the years to come.

I see one of the distinguished Senators from the South, who knows much more about cotton than I do. I invite his discussion of this particular problem at any time he desires. I wish to say to him that the analysis I am now giving came from the distinguished senior Senator from Georgia [Mr. GEORGE]. When we successfully find a market for 4,000,000 bales of cotton abroad, what are the results, as compared with the domestic consumption of that additional amount?

Well, the article manufactured from the raw cotton is worth from 10 to 20 times as much as the raw cotton itself. Take a 17-pound cotton rug. At 10 cents a pound, to make the calculation easy, the cotton in the rug is worth $1.70, but the rug may cost at retail $15, $25, or $30, the added price going to the textile mills of America, to the retail merchants, to the railroads and to other businessmen and workers.

Mr. President, it seems to me that it is foolish beyond description to struggle to find abroad a market for our cotton, which our own people desperately need.

Mr. CHAVEZ. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. DOWNEY. I yield.

Mr. CHAVEZ. In line with the statement of the Senator from California, and speaking only from what I know about my State, if the children of the United States, as well as the adults, were able to obtain only the food which nature requires, we should have no surplus of wheat and foodstuffs in the United States. I am speaking advisedly, from what I know about New Mexico. Many of the people are not getting sufficient bread and other foodstuffs actually to keep body and soul together.

Mr. DOWNEY. Mr. President, I know that what the Senator from New Mexico says is true; and I believe distinguished Senators from the South will agree with me when I make the statement that from 75 to 80 percent of their own people do not have the cotton products they should have. What a nightmare world we live in, with boundless fertility, energetic labor, and a devoted people. We struggle, we strive, we plough under, we subsidize, we waste, and destroy farm products for which at least one-third of the American people are hungry. As I recall, one of the distinguished southern Senators told me a few months ago that the overwhelming proportion of the people in the South have nowhere near the amount of cotton products they need and could utilize.

Mr. President, I could have better referred to my own State of California where year after year there has been a waste of farm products and factory capacity that should cause every American heart to despair. I remember at one time I was so juvenile and indiscreet as to own some beautiful orchards producing peaches for canning. Oh, we successfully grew a most beautiful and bountiful crop, but year after year, under agreement with the other orchard owners, we knocked one-half the fruit off the trees, and very often could not successfully market even what was left. I would go into the great cities of the United States and find that probably not 20 percent of the people in those cities ever tasted a canned peach except as a matter of special treat and on rare occasions.

So it is all over the United States. In every great rural region tremendous problems arise from the production of bountiful crops in the fertile soil which nature has given us. Those crops we waste and destroy; we make but little real effort to give the American people a decent buying power so that they may enjoy the products of their farms and factories.

The economists of this Nation, starting with the assumption that we are now producing about $70,000,000,000 of wealth annually, state that, if we had complete employment and a full market for our farm and factory products we could step up the national income to at least $110,000,000,000 within a few years time. Do not think there would be any great effort involved in doing that. All that would be necessary would be to give the farmer and the factory proprietor a market, and from farms now being cultivated, from factories now in operation, from railroads now running, from labor wanting desperately to work that $110,000,000,000 of wealth would flow.

Mr. GEORGE. Mr. President, will the Senator from California yield?

Mr. DOWNEY. I yield.

Mr. GEORGE. I have this thought, which is based on practical everyday knowledge: The average family in the cotton-growing section of the Southeast—I do not speak of cotton-growing sections of the Senator's State of California and other States—could use on the basis of the retail market an additional $100 in value of cotton products per annum and would not be oversupplied in any single particular. I know that to be true in my State, and I believe it to be true in every Southeastern State.

There are in the United States somewhat more than 2,000,000 cotton growers, but, in round numbers, let us say there are 2,000,000. I am satisfied that on the basis of the retail prices paid for cotton products every single family unit could well use and actually needs an average of at least $100 additional for their supply of various cotton products which must be used in the home.

I think the Senator is entirely right also with respect to another matter which seems to me to be fundamental. The real wealth of the Nation is the employed time of the men and women who work; it is the time employed in making goods and providing services. After all, that is the real wealth of any people; and when any considerable number of people are idle, tremendous actual wealth goes to waste, or, to put it the other way, potential waste that might be avoided by increasing the actual wealth of the country.

It may seem to those who do not live in the South and who are not familiar with the conditions there somewhat of an overstatement, yet I do not know of a single county in my State where the families could not on the average use, without being oversupplied but only reasonably supplied, an additional $100 worth of cotton goods and cotton products based on the retail price for such products.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, will the Senator from California yield there?

Mr. DOWNEY. I yield.

Mr. NORRIS. I am wondering why the Senator from Georgia confines his suggestion merely to cotton-growing families in the South? Why does his statement not apply to the whole Nation?

Mr. GEORGE. I think it does.

Mr. NORRIS. Why is it not true that the same statement the Senator has made in regard to the ordinary cotton-growing family applies to every other ordinary family in the United States?

Mr. GEORGE. In my opinion, it does, but I was speaking of the Southeast, because I have such an intimate knowledge of conditions there. All my life I have known families, both white and colored, living on cotton farms, and I know that actual need, on a reasonable basis of comfort, would increase their purchases of cotton products by $100 a year if they had the purchasing power with which to secure those products.

Mr. DOWNEY. Mr. President, I am very grateful for the comment of the distinguished Senator from Georgia, who speaks with such authority in this particular problem. I should like at this time to say that he has so often and so consistently helped me with advice and counsel that I am under a very great debt of gratitude to him. I likewise am very happy to hear the very distinguished Senator from Nebraska make the comment he did. I think that kind of comment, coming from him, means a great deal, much more than if it came from myself.

Mr. President, before considering the tremendous increase of Federal receipts that would come if we had full employment and a total income in this Nation, I wish to point out the tremendous waste that comes from unemployment.

During the last 10 years the Federal Government has spent at least $3,000,000,000 a year for unemployment relief, and I have no doubt that the States, cities, and counties have spent in excess of a billion dollars more every year because of unemployment.

General employment would do away with this corrupting, devitalizing, unhappy relief spending. General employment would thus save our governmental agencies at least $4,000,000,000 annually.

But we have another tremendous saving both in human material and in money that total employment would bring. Do you know where the criminals of our Nation come from? They come chiefly from the unemployed youth of America. Yes, the unemployed boys of America are the principal beneficiaries of our penitentiaries today; and, on the most conservative figures, the cost of crime springing from the unemployment of men is at least another $3,000,000,000 a year.

Mr. President, sometimes this American picture seems almost like a nightmare. We are willing to spend billions upon boys in the penitentiary, billions in devitalizing and pauperizing persons on relief, but we are not willing to put our unemployed to work on great social projects such as highway building, which everybody in America agrees we ought to have.

Mr. President, in a few days this Chamber will ring with argument over another tax bill, another appropriation bill. Then we shall begin to figure one of two ways by which we can get the money to arm ourselves. One way will be to borrow it, and the other will be to tax our citizens more. I doubt if there will be one statement from the White House or one statement in Congress to the effect that we had better get increased Federal receipts from employing our people and increasing the income of the Nation. I pray that I am wrong, because increased taxes and increased borrowing with our present national income will but precipitate us further and further along the road to some great abyss. But, Mr. President, under a capitalistic economy the national income proceeds from the sale of the products of the laborer, the farmer, the factory proprietor, the professional, and businessman. Whenever we fully utilize the wealth and labor of this country we shall increase our Federal receipts to such an extent that we shall not know what to do with the money. We have lived under this complex of poverty so long that it is beyond our comprehension that we are the wealthiest people of all time, and all we have to do is to operate our farms and factories at full capacity, and every governmental agency in the United States will be deluged with an income beyond what it can utilize.

Mr. President, I have duplicate placards on each side of the Senate Chamber. Those placards were prepared for me by the Government Printing Office, and I am sure you will admit that they, at least, did a first-class job. The first two rows of figures are taken from a Treasury report issued last year, showing the Federal tax receipts which would accrue from a national income of $70,000,000,000 and of $90,000,000,000. The $110,000,000,000 is my own extension, which is undoubtedly too conservative, because I showed only the same increase from ninety to one hundred and ten billion dollars that occurred from seventy to ninety billion dollars, while, as you will note, the rate of increase is accelerated.

Mr. President, I do not know a single economist or industrialist in the United States who will not admit that with total employment within 3 or 4 years we could produce a national income of $110,000,000,000. Mr. Willkie, who is supposed to be a conservative, recently proclaimed that in 4 years he could increase the national income to $150,000,000,000. I rather think Mr. Willkie was somewhat overoptimistic, but I am glad he made that statement, anyway, because it points out how very conservative is my figure of $110,000,000,000.

Mr. President, those figures have been submitted to several statisticians and economists in Washington, and none of them would deny their validity. What do they show? They show that on the tax rates which existed before the last tax bill, and on a national income of $70,000,000,000, our Federal receipts run to $6,000,000,000; but if we could step up the national income to $110,000,000,000 we would have Federal tax receipts of $15,200,000,000, or over $9,000,000,000 more than our present receipts. Let me likewise point out, Mr. President, that our States, cities, and counties by that same flow of wealth coming from general employment would increase their tax revenues by two or three billion dollars more. It is certain, Mr. President, the Federal Government could have plenty of money if we had prosperity in this Nation.

Mr. President, I suppose everybody will admit that the reason why we have not developed a great air force and a larger Army up to the present time was that we were going so heavily into debt that we did not dare to spend the money. All of us knew the war picture in Germany 2 and 3 years ago. Ambassador Bullitt and Ambassador Kennedy told us the whole story almost two years ago, and many of the Senators on the Military Affairs Committee wanted to start right then upon rebuilding and strengthening our Army and air force. Why did we not do it? We are just too poor. With the greatest factories and technicians in the world, able physically to pour out endless streams of munitions, we were just too poor!

Mr. President, I have heard the distinguished senior Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. WALSH] state at least twice on the floor of the Senate his solemn opinion that our capitalistic economy cannot endure the burden of increasing armament, and that we shall crash within the next few years. I have heard Senator after Senator repeat the same thing in the cloakrooms, that our capitalistic economy is doomed to destruction with this ever-increasing debt and the increasing burden of armament now thrown upon us. I take it that almost every Senator must look forward with gloomy apprehension if we are to have a great army of unemployed and a continued national income of only $70,000,000,000.

Ten years ago this Nation was producing a national income greater than we are producing today. There is not an economist who will not admit our ability, by increasing capital and invention, to have increased our national income from three to four billion dollars a year. Over the past 10 years we could have built up our income from the $100,000,000,000 we could have produced 10 years ago to $125,000,000,000 or $150,000,000,000. But instead of increasing from the potential hundred billion of 10 years ago we are now down to about seventy billion.

What is going to happen in the next 10 years? Is there one plan, is there one program, is there one hope for the American people for what lies beyond this temporary armament boom? If so, I do not know what it is.

The figures now indicate that we are not doing as well as we were doing 10 years ago. We are complacent; we boast of what we have done, but the sheer, cold fact is—taking the conservative figures of Brookings Institution—that 10 years ago we had a possible, practical capacity of a hundred billion, and now we are down to seventy billion, and our only hope of relief is to pour out billions upon billions in the production of armaments and destructive materials with which to defend ourselves or attack other people.

Mr. President, this discussion could be continued over many more hours, because it is an immense field. But I shall conclude. I shall not call up my amendment for vote today; I shall call it up some time next week. Of course, I deeply regret that more Senators have not been here to consider the facts and figures to which I have called attention, but I do deeply appreciate the attention of those who have been present.

Mr. McNARY. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. DOWNEY. I yield.

Mr. McNARY. I was absent during one portion of the Senator's discussion, and I will not impose on him if he has covered what I am about to inquire about; but I was concerned in a statement made a few days ago that the Army and Navy Departments, or the national-defense establishments, is constructing tanks to weigh 20 tons, 40 tons, 50 tons, and that there are some in contemplation which will weigh as high as 70 tons. I think none of the latter class are being constructed, but specifications have been drawn for them, and it is only a question of time before they will be in the course of construction.

As an observer, and one who travels the highways occasionally, I should like to ask this question: In the view of the Senator, would any of the present bridges and highways stand use by a truck or a tank weighing 50 tons or 70 tons, would the bridges hold them, are the tunnels wide enough and high enough, and is the concrete of the hard-surfaced roads sufficient in strength to support them? If not, would it not be better that we construct our roads to permit of use by these tanks, and is that not a part of the national defense we should consider in the construction of roads?

I do not know whether the Senator discussed that phase of the matter, but it is so intimately associated in my mind with national preparedness, that I thought it appropriate to propound the question. I appreciate the opportunity the Senator affords me.

Mr. DOWNEY. Mr. President, I am very grateful for the question propounded by our distinguished candidate for Vice President, if I may address him in that way. I regret that I have consumed so much time that I have not had the opportunity to discuss the question of military highways. I think the implications of the question asked by the Senator from Oregon can be answered only in the affirmative; that is, that we very vitally need heavy, modern, far-reaching highways for proper military defense.

As I have said in my investigations on highways, I have been aided by the advice of Dr. Miller McClintock, noted road engineer and traffic expert. I have several quotations here from him, but I will read merely the one regarding the need of superhighways for military purposes. This quotation is from a letter written me by Dr. Miller McClintock:

> Many critical portions of the trunk highway system of the Nation and almost all portions of principal routes of travel in urban areas are now congested. In fact, many of the more important routes are quite incapable of carrying normal civilian traffic with even tolerable efficiency. This is particularly true in the dense traffic areas of the Atlantic seaboard. One cannot help but look with the gravest apprehension to the conditions which would exist in the case of the necessity for large-scale evacuation of civilian populations or the necessity to move with rapidity, under emergency circumstances, large volumes of military traffic.
> In view of the fact that the essence of the defense program is the creation of a highly mobile defense mechanism, it would be nothing short of disastrous to fail to obtain complete assurance that such mobility can in fact be achieved. It is noteworthy that Germany keyed its military machine very closely to the functions of a Nation-wide [autobahn] system. We have only a few miles of comparable roadways in the United States.

I hope that is an answer to the Senator.

Mr. WILEY. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. DANAHER in the chair). Does the Senator from California yield to the Senator from Wisconsin?

Mr. DOWNEY. I yield.

Mr. WILEY. I think I have heard most of the Senator's remarks, and the thing that is troubling me is his statement that if we build highways, it will take care of the slack of labor. I have noticed in a good many communities where large highway expansion has been undertaken that the projects do not demand the amount of labor one would think they would employ. I wonder whether the Senator has gone into that phase of the subject. In other words, would the labor that is unemployed turn to the highways? Would those laborers do the work? Would that kind of work appeal to them? After all, in order to get the income the Senator mentions, we have to get the people back to work. I wonder whether the Senator has analyzed that phase of the subject.

Mr. DOWNEY. Yes; I have thought a great deal about it and I might say to the Senator from Wisconsin that certainly his question is a very valuable and pointed one. I think his implication is that, due to great, modern, titanic machines, we would not employ very many men in a road-building program. Is that the implication of the question?

Mr. WILEY. Partially so.

Mr. DOWNEY. Or that men would not desire to work?

Mr. WILEY. Yes.

Mr. DOWNEY. I might say, in answer to the last question, as I stated before, around every projected highway, around every cement plant, and sand and gravel plant, there are scores and hundreds of scores of men desperate for that very work. Any contractor can get a hundred unskilled laborers for every one he can use.

As to the other question, there is indeed a great moral in the Senator's question—as to whether or not a great road-building program could absorb the labor supply in this country. Let me give to the Senator a set of figures to support the implication which he draws from his question.

In the United States in the last few years we have built 5 or 6 great social projects—Boulder Dam, Coulee, Bonneville, the great project in the Sacramento Valley, and the greatest of all, due largely to the energy and outstanding leadership of the senior Senator from Nebraska [Mr. NORRIS], the

T. V. A., and, in addition, the great San Francisco bridges. Those are tremendous projects. But all those projects together did not employ together a total of over 50,000 men, over an average period of 4 or 5 years.

On these questions I have often consulted with Mr. Kaiser, of San Francisco, one of our greatest contractors there, who has constructed over a thousand miles of highway and has been associated with the building of most of the great projects in the West.

One time I expressed to him my opinion of the great projects he had helped to build. He replied, "Compared to what our labor and machines could build they amount to very little." He is strongly sold on beginning great superhighway projects in every city, in every rural region, in every State in the Union.

What the Senator from Wisconsin must understand is that the rebuilding of our highways means largely the rebuilding of our cities. The traffic experts are in despair when men say, "Let us tear down our slums and build modern apartment houses."

The say, "In the name of reason, no; tear down the slums, yes; but use the vacant land for rights-of-way and parking spaces and depots."

By highway building we could reconstruct America by the power of modern machinery. Through the full use of our idle we could approach this civilization of which our forefathers dreamed. What the Senator points out, the tremendous power of modern machinery, merely means that we can construct more of these projects, and not that we could not fully employ our idle.

Mr. LUNDEEN. Mr. President, will the able Senator yield?

Mr. DOWNEY. I yield.

Mr. LUNDEEN. Regretting that I have not had an opportunity to hear the entire statement of the able Senator from California, I certainly agree with what he has just said.

I wish to remind Senators that, as a companion bill to that introduced by J. BUELL SNYDER, of Pennsylvania, I introduced a bill for superhighways in this country, a bill which would employ large numbers of men. I think these housing projects and these road projects that the able Senator is now mentioning will need our attention in the not-distant future, and we had better take heed before it is too late. Millions of men must be employed. Unemployment must be cured; it must be solved. We cannot permit these awful conditions of ill-housed, ill-fed, and ill-clothed people to continue. If we do so we may imperil the very existence of this great democracy, inherited by us from the founders and fathers of this mighty Republic.

Mr. DOWNEY. Mr. President, I thank the Senator from Minnesota for his contribution, and I want all Senators to know that, of course, I claim no credit or pride of authorship in this matter. Many Senators and Representatives and innumerable leaders all over the United States have thought and worked and propagandized for these great highways long before I was ever a humble laborer in that vineyard, and I know that the Senator from Minnesota has long been one of the outstanding champions of superhighway building.

Mr. BARKLEY. Mr. President, will the Senator yield at that point?

Mr. DOWNEY. I yield.

Mr. BARKLEY. I have always been interested in the highway problem, and I am very much interested in the Senator's ideas about it.

The Senator will recall that last year I introduced and secured the passage of a bill through the Senate providing for the lending of money for various sorts of projects. It was known as the lending bill, but its enemies dubbed it the "lending-spending bill." That bill was never acted on in the House, but before it left the Senate, the Senate struck out a very modest provision for at least some experimenting in the question of superhighways.

The entire expense called for was not even to be borne by the Federal Government, but the measure provided for loans to States and cities and counties to enable them to embark upon the construction of some superhighways in congested parts of the country. In the hearings and on the floor the question of Chicago was specifically discussed; also Baltimore, New York, St. Louis, and other large centers in this country where there is undoubtedly congestion. The Senate at that time was not even willing to provide for loaning money to States to enable them to buy the rights-of-way, or to engage in the improvement of these roads. The bill went on to the House, and received no attention there—even that part of it that was left.

I mention that not only to show my interest in what the Senator has said, and his view on it, but to show how difficult it is for us to make even a modest beginning in such a program.

Mr. DOWNEY. Mr. President, I wish to express my appreciation of the liberalism and the leadership of our distinguished Senator from Kentucky. I know that he certainly has carried the torch in legislation of this kind. I very well recall his bill, both in the committee and in the Senate, and the Senator will recall that I supported him in the committee, and while he asked for only a mere half billion, or a billion dollars—since I supported him then, I think he ought to support my proposal for $100,000,000,000. That is not very much more.

Mr. BARKLEY. I appreciate that; but that reminds me of the story of the man who made hash in a restaurant, by putting in half horse and half rabbit—one horse and one rabbit. [Laughter.]

I did not mention that to indicate my position with respect to the Senator's proposal. Of course, there is a great deal of difference between a half billion dollars and $100,000,000,000.

But I am interested, and I think the country is going to become more and more interested in realizing the congestion upon our highways. The more automobiles we have and the more we engage in the necessary national defense which we all visualize, and the more our population increases, the more attention we must give to the problem of roads. Now and then I read articles contending that our population has about reached a static position, and is not going to increase any more. I doubt that very seriously myself, because the more I travel the more children I see. I do not think any race suicide is being indulged in yet in this country.

The more these various elements converge to intensify this problem, the more these people and the American Congress are going to be compelled to devote their attention to some reasonable solution of it. It cannot be done in cash. We all realize now that large-scale development, either public or private, cannot generally be paid out of cash assets. So that some rational method sooner or later—and it may be the sooner the better—must be devised by which we can make a beginning toward solving this tremendous problem, and the Senator from California has, as he always does, made a very interesting contribution to the subject.

Mr. DOWNEY. Mr. President, I am not going to interrogate the distinguished leader as to just what he meant by that remark that we could not hope to pay for these investments with cash. He must be careful or he will find himself under the scrutiny of the Dies committee. I do not know what he meant, and I am not even going to ask him.

Mr. BARKLEY. There is no secret about it. I mean that we must borrow part of it, or a considerable part of it, probably, and provide for its amortization and repayment over a period of years.

Mr. DOWNEY. I misunderstood the Senator.

Mr. BARKLEY. If we were able to adopt the Senator's program, I doubt very much whether we could pay for it out of pocket. I do not understand that the Senator advocates that, notwithstanding the fact that he has certain very well defined views upon the excess savings that have been accumulated in this country. Even the figures that the Senator has given to us heretofore would not be sufficient to carry out a program of that kind by paying cash.

Mr. DOWNEY. Mr. President, I do not want to be drawn into any discussion at this late hour on economics, but I might say that many of the outstanding economists of the Nation say that over the next 10 years, if we should have full prosperity, we would have approximately $10,000,000,000 of capital or savings coming largely from the individuals of the United States, for which there would be no outlet in residential construction or capital formation, and that there would be approximately $100,000,000,000 seeking investment in other sources over 10 years of prosperity.

I might also say to the distinguished Senator from Kentucky that I embodied the economic figures on that in a small book which I published and heretofore handed to the Senator from Kentucky, and I hope he may find the leisure to read it.

Mr. President, I desire to conclude merely with this statement. Reverting now to the particular measure before us, we are contemplating the possibility that our sovereign Government may declare to the youth of America that it is their obligation in peacetime to be drafted into training camps, to prepare them for military service in the eventuality of war. Regardless of how we may feel with respect to this particular bill, I hope that every Senator present will agree with me in this conclusion—that in this complicated mechanical civilization of ours, whenever our sovereign Government intends to enforce against its citizens the right of conscription for military training in peacetime, certainly that Government ought to assume the correlative duty and obligation to give that citizen at least the opportunity to work. That not only constitutes natural justice—it would be sound statecraft looking to the preservation of our civilization and the wise preparation of our military defense.

VAST POWER SOURCE IN ATOMIC ENERGY OPENED BY SCIENCE—RELATIVE OF URANIUM FOUND TO YIELD FORCE 5,000,000 TIMES AS POTENT AS COAL—GERMANY IS SEEKING IT—SCIENTISTS ORDERED TO DEVOTE ALL TIME TO RESEARCH—TESTS MADE AT COLUMBIA

(By William L. Laurence)

A natural substance found abundantly in many parts of the earth, now separated for the first time in pure form, has been found in pioneer experiments at the physics department of Columbia University to be capable of yielding such energy that 1 pound of it is equal in power output to 5,000,000 pounds of coal or 3,000,000 pounds of gasoline, it became known yesterday.

The discovery was announced in the current issue of the Physical Review, official publication of American physicists and one of the leading scientific journals of its kind in the world.

REVOLUTIONARY PROMISE

Prof. John R. Dunning, Columbia physicist, who headed the scientific team whose research led to the experimental proof of the vast power in the newly isolated substance, told a colleague, it was learned, that improvement in the methods of extraction of the substance was the only step that remained to be solved for its introduction as a new source of power. Other leading physicists agreed with him.

A chunk of 5 to 10 pounds of the new substance, a close relative of uranium, and known as U–235, would drive an ocean liner or an ocean-going submarine for an indefinite period around the oceans of the world without refueling, it was said, for such a chunk would possess the power output of 25,000,000 to 50,000,000 pounds of coal, or of 15,000,000 to 30,000,000 pounds of gasoline.

TESTED WITH ATOM-SMASHER

Until about 2 months ago not even an infinitesimal drop of the substance had been isolated in pure form and the task of doing so appeared hopeless from a practical point of view. Toward the end of February a minute fraction of a gram was isolated at the University of Minnesota Physics Department, under the direction of Prof. Alfred O. Nier. The sample was rushed at once to Columbia University, where Professor Dunning, in collaboration with Dr. E. T. Booth and Dr. Aristid V. Grosse, submitted it to tests with the Columbia 150-ton cyclotron (atom-smasher).

The sample, however, was so small that the results, while striking, served merely to stimulate the scientists at Columbia and Minnesota to further efforts. So fast has the work progressed since the beginning of March, the report in the Physical Review says that the yield has been increased two-hundredfold.

Such an increase in 2 months has given new hope that a process for isolating the substance in larger quantities, in grams and pounds instead of millionths of a gram, will be found in the not too distant future. While scientists refuse to make predictions, it is not impossible that a few months or a year hence may see the realization of this quest.

The fact that industrial laboratories also have taken up the quest and are lending to their university colleagues the vast experimental resources at their disposal is revealed in the same issue of the Physical Review, in a report from the research laboratories at the General Electric Co. by Dr. K. H. Kingdon and Dr. H. C. Pollock, also signed by Professor Dunning and Dr. Booth. The report reveals that the G. E. scientists also have set up an apparatus similar to that of Professor Nier and in their turn have separated a relatively large sample of the U–235. This sample was submitted also to experimental tests at Columbia and corroborated the results obtained from the University of Minnesota samples.

NAZIS PUSH RESEARCH

The main reason why scientists are reluctant to talk about this development, regarded as ushering in the long dreamed of age of atomic power and, therefore, as one of the greatest, if not the greatest, discovery in modern science, is the tremendous implications this discovery bears on the possible outcome of the European war, it was explained.

The news has leaked out, through highly reliable channels, that the Nazi government had heard of the research in American laboratories and had ordered its greatest scientists to concentrate their energies on the solution of this problem. Every German scientist in this field, physicists, chemists, and engineers, it was learned, have been ordered to drop all other researches and devote themselves to this work alone. All these research workers, it was learned, are carrying on their tasks feverishly at the laboratories of the Kaiser Wilhelm Institute at Berlin.

The American scientists, it was said, are in the dark as to what their German colleagues are doing and what progress, if any, they have made. It is believed, however, that the American scientists are in the lead, as Germany does not possess the powerful cyclotrons of American laboratories, and these machines are necessary for carrying out the most effective experiments in studying the energies within the nuclei (cores) of atoms.

However, it was asserted that, while cyclotrons are a prime requisite for determining the amount of energy contained in the new substance, the apparatus necessary for its isolation in small quantities was relatively simple and inexpensive, so that the Germans on learning of the American research no doubt could duplicate it.

On the other hand it is not believed that this particular apparatus will ever be useful in separating U–235 on a large scale. New plans are being made to isolate the substance on a practical scale, but the plans and the designs for these will be kept a secret to be given only to the United States Government to do with as it sees fit.

A startling discovery about the new power source, also made as a result of the Columbia experiments, is the simplicity of the method of liberating its vast energy. All that is needed to put it to work running motors and steamships is to place it in a tank of water and keep it supplied with a constant flow of cold water.

Left by itself, the substance would be inactive. As soon as it touched water of ordinary temperature it would automatically start to liberate its energy. The water would be turned into steam and the steam would drive powerful turbines. The new water supplied would keep the process going indefinitely. To stop it, all that would be necessary would be to cut off the water supply.

Thus the process would be the nearest practical approach to a form of perpetual motion, for as long as the U–235 would be supplied with water it would keep on liberating its energy until exhausted.

TERRIFIC EXPLOSIVE POWER

It was figured out, by way of another example, that 1 pound of the U–235 contains as much energy as 15,000 tons (30,000,000 pounds) of TNT, or 300 carloads of 50 tons each. If this 1 pound of U–235 exploded within one ten-thousandths of a second, as does ordinary TNT, the pressure produced would be on the order of 100,000,000,000 atmospheres (10 to the seventeenth power dynes to a square centimeter), about 1,000,000 times the pressure produced by TNT or by nitroglycerin.

On the other hand, it was estimated by an explosion expert, the explosion of such a pound of U–235 would produce a crater much less than 300 feet in radius and probably only 75 feet in radius.

The largest amount of explosives ever to have been exploded was 6,000 tons of a mixture of ammonium nitrate and ammonium sulfate in Oppau, Germany, about 14 years ago. That explosion was accidental, as the mixture was supposed to be a fertilizer. The resulting crater was about 600 feet wide and 250 feet deep.

The U–235 is what is known as an isotope, or chemical twin of ordinary uranium. Even its existence was not known until a few years ago, and its properties had been unsuspected until a short time ago.

Up to a few months ago it was believed to exist in minute amounts in association with ordinary uranium, the proportion of the two having been regarded as being of the order of 1,000 parts of uranium to 1 part of the U–235, or about one-tenth of 1 percent.

Suspicion first was cast on the possible nature of the U–235 as a great energy source, on purely theoretical grounds, by Prof. Niels Bohr, Nobel prize-winning physicist of the University of Copenhagen, Denmark, who carried on his researches last summer at the Institute for Advanced Study at Princeton, N. J., and by Dr. John A. Wheeler, of Princeton University.

DANE SPEEDED TESTS HERE

Professor Bohr was one of the first to learn of the discovery in Germany in January 1939, that when an ordinary sample of uranium, containing mixtures of three chemical twins, is bombarded with neutrons, fundamental atomic constituents carrying no electric charge; the uranium produces among the debris of its atoms the much lighter element barium.

Immediately communicating these results to his colleague, Prof. Enrico Fermi, another Nobel prize winning physicist, at Columbia University, and to other leading physicists, the true nature of the results obtained in Germany soon was determined. Repeating the German experiments at Columbia, Johns Hopkins, the Carnegie Institution of Washington, and other laboratories, the physicists came upon the discovery that they were witnessing here for the first time a release of the binding energy within atoms on a scale greater than ever before.

What was happening, they discovered, was a splitting of the heavy uranium atom into two parts, one of which was barium of atomic weight 137, thus accounting for the barium observed in the German experiments by Prof. Otto Hahn and Dr. Lise Meitner. In the process of the splitting (fission) of the uranium atom by the neutrons, the binding energy holding the uranium atom together was liberated to the extent of 200,000,000 electron volts.

It was then for the first time (it took place in the early spring and summer, 1939) that attention was called to the neglected and unsung uranium isotope of atomic weight 235. Basing their reasoning on observations that atoms of even atomic weight are inclined to be less stable than atoms of odd atomic weights, Professor Bohr and Dr. Wheeler presented the theory that it was the minute fraction of U–235 in the uranium sample that was responsible for the release of the 200,000,000 electron volts when the uranium atom was split by a neutron.

The reasoning by Dr. Bohr and Dr. Wheeler was as follows: When uranium 238 is hit by a neutron that enters its nucleus, the atomic weight of the uranium is increased to 239, an odd-numbered weight, and hence a stable, nonexploding atom. On the other hand, when uranium 235 is hit by a neutron that enters its nucleus, the atomic weight becomes 236, an even-numbered atomic weight, and hence a nonstable, exploding atom.

This theory split the physicists into two camps, one agreeing with Dr. Bohr and Dr. Wheeler and the other disagreeing. The Columbia experiments have settled the question definitely in favor of the Bohr hypothesis, according to the report.

Another question that until now had remained unsettled, and upon which the crux of the whole matter depended, was whether an atom of uranium, once hit by a neutron and split into two, would release other neutrons from its nucleus and thus start a "chain reaction," in the manner of a firecracker, that would keep the process regenerating by itself, without any further need for neutron bullets from outside sources. Unless such a process took place, naturally, there would be no hope of putting the uranium 235 to work on a practical scale.

This all-important question also has been settled by the Columbia experiments in favor of the "firecracker hypothesis," the experiments establishing definitely for the first time that only one neutron, slowed down by water to travel with very low energy (one-fortieth of a volt), behaves in the manner of a trigger that sets off the process of energy liberation from the uranium 235, it was reported.

Moreover, it was pointed out, even this one "trigger" neutron is not necessary to be supplied from any apparatus. The air is full of minute amounts of radium that constantly liberate neutrons by hitting atoms in the air. In addition, there are the omnipresent, all-penetrating cosmic rays that constantly bombard the earth from outer space. These powerful radiations also liberate neutrons from air atoms and, in fact, play a part in starting off the trigger action in neon signs, the starting of which needs free electrons that are supplied by the radiations in the air produced by the radium and cosmic rays.

A building such as the Empire State, it was asserted, contains scattered radium in minute amounts that would equal a whole gram, worth about $25,000 in current prices. Without such radiations in the atmosphere, it was explained, neon lamps would have to be supplied with free electrons from an outside source and would be much more expensive.

STARTING ENERGY TO WORK

To start the "philosopher's stone" in the U–235 to work, it was explained further, all that is necessary is one neutron traveling at low energy, the lower the better. Now, neutrons, as they come out of the cores of atoms, travel with high energy, and it is therefore necessary to slow them down.

Fortunately, protons, the cores of hydrogen atoms, constituting two-thirds of the volume of water, have the power to make neutrons yield up their high energies and to slow them down to almost no energy at all. Hence, all that is necessary to start the U–235 liberating its great energy is to place it in an environment of ordinary water.

Nothing left to slow down the fast-traveling neutrons, and fast neutrons just go through the uranium without breaking up its atoms and releasing its energy. This brings the whole process to a stop until more cool water is supplied.

As one leading physicist explained it, "the colder the water the better the reaction. The reaction is self-limiting because heat (generated by the split atoms) speeds up the neutrons, and the faster the neutrons the less the reaction."

"The faster you feed in the cold water," the scientist added, "the faster the water will come out red hot on the other side, because more neutrons will be slowed down, and thus more atoms split and more energy is liberated. Thus the process is admirably suited for power purposes."

Uranium ore, it was said, is "more abundant than copper" and is found in the Belgian Congo, in Canada, in Colorado, and in England, as well as in Germany, in relatively large amounts. It is 1,000,000 times more abundant than radium, with which it is associated in pitchblende ores.

Another significant discovery, of practical bearing on the question of isolating the substance in usable amounts, was the redetermination of the relative abundance of the U–235 by Professor Nier. Whereas it had been believed as recently as last year that it existed in a ratio of only 1,000 to 1, compared with ordinary uranium of atomic weight 238, Professor Nier found that the ratio is much smaller, 139 pounds of ordinary uranium containing 1 pound of the U–235. This finding alone has increased automatically the amount of the new "philosopher's stone" by more than seven times and therefore makes its isolation seven times easier.

Germany, it was asserted, may regret her act of having sent into exile Dr. Lise Meitner, who, with Professor Hahn, made the first observations that led to the discovery of the fountainhead of atomic energy that German scientists are so feverishly working to harness. Soon after her exile, when she settled at Stockholm, Sweden, Dr. Meitner revealed the results of her work with Professor Hahn to colleagues of Professor Bohr, who at once communicated it to his colleagues in America. Had Germany then realized the importance of the findings, it is highly probable, it was said, that she would have kept it a strict military secret and possibly later would have surprised the world with it.

In addition to the uranium of mass 238 and the newly isolated uranium of atomic weight 235, there is a third and much rarer type of uranium, of atomic weight 234. This isotope exists in the ratio of 1 to 17,000, compared with ordinary uranium 238.

Neither uranium 238 nor uranium 234, small amounts of which also have been separated, has been found to liberate energy on being bombarded with slow neutrons. Uranium 238 responds to fast neutrons, but the process in this case would be impracticable, it was pointed out. The Columbia experiments have demonstrated also for the first time, Dr. Dunning and his associates report, that the uranium of mass 234 plays no part in the energy-liberating process.

FIVE-POUND MASS NECESSARY

Because of the nature of the neutrons, even the slow-traveling ones, it was explained further, it is necessary to have a mass of at least 5 pounds, and possibly as high as 20, to make the process work on a practical scale. In a smaller amount even low-energy neutrons would escape into the open without splitting the initial trigger atom that sets off the process. To start the process it is necessary for the neutron to remain inside the mass, so that it would enter the nucleus of an atom to start the splitting process.

However, it was said, it would not be necessary to obtain a mass of 5 to 20 pounds of pure U–235 to start the process. A concentration of 10 to 50 percent would be sufficient. In other words, a 5-pound mass of uranium mixture that contained half to 2½ pounds of the U–235 would be sufficient for use as a prime motive power for submarines, and for other sources of power.

Such a mass, it was explained, "would make the most powerful cyclotron puny by comparison and would provide neutron radiations thousands of times greater than that produced by any cyclotrons. By comparison with such a mass, a cyclotron would be a mere plaything, and the mass would be much less expensive than a cyclotron.

The power from the U–235, it was added, could be applied in many other useful ways. It would provide the most powerful source of neutron rays that might possibly be used in the treatment of cancer, as neutrons are much more powerful than either X-rays or radium. The neutron from the U–235 could be used also for the creation of artificially radioactive elements more powerful than radium. They could even be used for making gold out of mercury, but scientists expressed themselves as disdainful of such uses for their newest creative tool.

One of the scientists explained the process of the energy liberation from U–235 by comparing it with the burning of coal. Whereas coal uses oxygen to liberate its energy, he explained, the U–235 uses slow neutrons for the same purpose. The process of combustion in the case of the U–235, he added, is, atom for atom, 100,000,000 times as effective as is the case in the combustion of coal. However, as the atomic weight of the uranium is 235, compared with 16 for the oxygen and 12 for the carbon, there are fewer uranium atoms to a given weight than there are oxygen and carbon atoms. This reduces the energy relations of the U–235, compared with coal, to a ratio of 5,000,000 to 1.

There are several new methods being considered for increasing the yield of the new substance to large-scale amounts. But as to this, scientists greet the questioner with a profound silence.

Mr. LEE obtained the floor.

REGULATION OF FIRE, MARINE, AND CASUALTY INSURANCE IN THE DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA

Mr. KING. Mr. President, will the Senator yield for the consideration of a bill? If it requires more than 2 or 3 minutes, I shall withdraw the request.

Mr. LEE. I yield.

Mr. KING. I ask unanimous consent that the Senate proceed to the consideration of House bill 9722.

Mr. McNARY. Mr. President, may I inquire what is the request of the able Senator from Utah?

Mr. KING. I ask unanimous consent that the unfinished business be temporarily laid aside and that the Senate proceed to consider House bill 9722, a bill for the regulation of the business of fire, marine, and casualty insurance in the District of Columbia.

Mr. McNARY. What is the calendar number?

Mr. KING. Two thousand and eight.

Mr. McCARRAN. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. LEE. I yield.

Mr. McCARRAN. The bill was submitted to a subcommittee of the Committee on the District of Columbia, of which subcommittee I had the privilege of being chairman. Investigation was made and hearings were held on the bill and on the subject. Subsequently the bill was reported with the amendments suggested by the committee. It has been on the calendar for some time.

Day before yesterday the Senator from Connecticut submitted certain amendments. I have not had an opportunity to read them. I have not looked at them. In view of my knowledge of the ability of the able Senator from Connecticut, I take it that they are amendments which should be considered. So far as I am concerned, I think the whole matter should now be reconsidered by the committee which had the matter in charge, because of the diligent study which was made by the subcommittee of the Committee on the District of Columbia, and because of the importance of the subject to the District of Columbia. I for one hope that the matter will not come up without an opportunity for those of us who are required to give interest to the subject because of our membership on the Committee on the District of Columbia, to consider the matter. I hope that the bill will not be taken up until the committee has had an opportunity again to consider it. I hope I am not mistaken in saying that the full District of Columbia Committee never considered the bill.

Mr. KING. The Senator is in error; but, in view of the Senator's attitude, I withdraw the request.

Mr. DANAHER. Mr. President, I ask the Senator from Oklahoma if he is willing to yield to me for a brief statement in connection with the matter referred to by the Senator from Utah?

Mr. LEE. My own statement will not be very long. The Senator may make his statement after I shall have concluded.

Mr. DANAHER. Very well. I thank the Senator.

PROPOSED TRANSFER OF DESTROYERS

Mr. LEE. Mr. President, in the interest of our own defense, I believe we should transfer 50 or more over-age destroyers to Great Britain. On different occasions and in different ways, the people of the United States have expressed themselves as favoring the policy of defending America by aiding Great Britain with everything but men. Both political parties, in their recent conventions, have gone on record as favoring material aid to Great Britain, provided, first, that it is not a violation of law, and second, that it does not weaken our own defenses. Let me quote from the 1940 Republican platform, which was adopted at Philadelphia:

> We favor the extension to all peoples fighting for liberty, or whose liberty is threatened, of such aid as shall not be in violation of international law or inconsistent with the requirements of our own national defense.

I quote from the 1940 Democratic platform adopted at Chicago:

> In self-defense and in good conscience, the world's greatest democracy cannot afford heartlessly or in a spirit of appeasement to ignore the peace-loving and liberty-loving peoples wantonly attacked by ruthless aggressors.
> We pledge to extend to these peoples all the material aid at our command, consistent with law and not inconsistent with the interests of our own national self-defense—all to the end that peace and international good faith may yet emerge triumphant.

Mr. President, the question of whether it would strengthen or weaken America's defenses to transfer our over-age destroyers to Great Britain has already been passed upon by two authorities best able to speak on that subject. General Pershing, former commander of the American Expeditionary Forces, has advocated the transfer of 50 destroyers on the ground that it would increase our own safety. Also, Admiral Standley, former Chief of Naval Operations, has advocated the transfer of the destroyers in the interest of America's defense.

Before such a transfer could be made, the law requires that the Chief of Naval Operations "shall first certify that such material is not essential to the defense of the United States." Therefore, if the Chief of Naval Operations should so certify, we should then have the opinions of the best qualified men in the Nation that such a transfer would not only not weaken America's defenses, but would strengthen them.

Mr. LUNDEEN. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. LEE. I yield.

Mr. LUNDEEN. The statement of the chairman of our Naval Affairs Committee, Senator WALSH, is opposed to the policy now being advocated by the able Senator. I should also like to say that I believe that a very large body of our citizens disagree in toto with the policy now being stated. The able Senator from Massachusetts has repeatedly stated that we cannot aid Britain by turning over our warships to that Empire.

Mr. LEE. Of course, the Senator has a perfect right to his opinion, and to express an opinion which is shared by others.

To continue, as to the legality of such a transfer, on August 10 four lawyers addressed a letter to the New York Times in which they set forth as their opinion that there is no legal bar to the transfer of the destroyers. They gave it as their opinion that there is ample authority in the present law for the transfer of over-age vessels to Great Britain. Those attorneys were Charles C. Burlingham, Thomas D. Thacher, George Rublee, and Dean Acheson. The letter containing their arguments was printed in the Appendix of the RECORD on August 12 at the request of the Senator from Florida [Mr. PEPPER]. I shall not read the entire letter, but I wish to quote certain paragraphs from the legal opinion of these attorneys. Quoting from the letter:

> In light of the fact that the Congress has provided for the free interchange of supplies and equipment between the Army and Navy, there is no reason to suppose that the Congress generally intended stricter rules to be applied to the release of naval supplies and equipment than to the release of military supplies and equipment. And this would seem to be particularly true in view of the fact that after naval planes had been transferred to the Army for the purpose of permitting their release to private manufacturers on an exchange basis the Congress chose to enlarge rather than to restrict authority of the Secretary of War to enter into contracts for the exchange of obsolescent equipment for new equipment, and conditioned the exercise of such authority solely upon the certification of the appropriate staff officer that such obsolescent equipment was not essential to national defense.

If it should be the opinion of the appropriate staff officers of both armed services, as it is the opinion of General Pershing, that the requirements of our national defense would be served rather than hurt by the release of some of our over-age destroyers for sale to the British, there should be no legal bar to effectuating their release under existing statutory authority.

It is true that on June 24 a ruling of the Attorney General was announced to the effect that private builders who were constructing new torpedo boats for the account of the Navy could not, even with the consent of the Navy, complete such boats to the order of a belligerent government. The Attorney General indicated that the sending out of the country by a private builder of a vessel of war built to enter the service of a belligerent would be a violation of section 3 of title V of the Espionage Act of June 15, 1917 (ch. 30, 40 Stat. 222, U. S. C., title 18, sec. 33), and possibly also of section 23 of title 18 of the United States Code.

It is clear, in our judgment, that neither these statutory provisions nor the views expressed by the Attorney General stand in the way of the sale to a belligerent of armed ships, like our old destroyers, which were not built or completed to the order of a belligerent.

Section 23 of title 18 of the United States Code is obviously not applicable to ships which were neither built nor equipped with a view to their entering the service of a belligerent power.

Mr. SCHWELLENBACH. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. JOHNSON of Colorado in the chair). Does the Senator from Oklahoma yield to the Senator from Washington?

Mr. LEE. I wish to finish the quotation.

Mr. SCHWELLENBACH. I wish to ask the Senator a question about that particular portion of the quotation. Does he prefer to have me wait until he concludes?

Mr. LEE. No; not in that case.

Mr. SCHWELLENBACH. Does not the Senator see that section 23 of title 18, referred to in the letter which was printed in the New York Times, is the provision of our law which prevents the building or outfitting of vessels with the intent, at the time of the building or outfitting, of selling them to a belligerent government?

Mr. LEE. That is the opinion of these attorneys.

Mr. SCHWELLENBACH. Mr. President, yes; and that is still the law, and it was the law in 1917 when the Espionage Act was passed. In view of the fact that that was the law which we already had on the statute books, a definite act which prohibits the building or outfitting of ships for the purpose and with the intent of turning them over to a belligerent, how can the Senator agree with the opinion of these four very distinguished lawyers when they attempt to say that the provision of section 3 of the Espionage Act, later referred to, which reads, as follows:

During a war in which the United States is a neutral Nation, it shall be unlawful to send out of the jurisdiction of the United States any vessel built, armed, or equipped as a vessel of war, or converted from a private vessel into a vessel of war, with the intent or under any agreement or contract, written or oral, that such vessel shall be delivered to a belligerent nation.

In other words, we already had on the statute books a law which covered the question of building or outfitting a vessel with the intent of having it turned over to a belligerent nation. In 1917 we enacted another statute which provided that it should be unlawful so long as we were a neutral; and the grammatical construction of the particular section, it seems to me, is absolutely clear that what we did in 1917 was to prohibit the transfer to a belligerent nation of vessels already constructed. I should like to have the Senator discuss the legal opinion from which he is quoting in the light of the suggestions which I make.

Mr. LEE. I appreciate the Senator's contribution, but it represents the opposite view to the view taken by these four attorneys who have discussed that point.

Mr. SCHWELLENBACH. No; let me say to the Senator they did not discuss that point. They construed section 3 of the act of 1917, and construed it differently from the way in which I construe it, but do not discuss the point that there was already in the law at the time the 1917 act was passed a section which specifically prohibited the things which they attempt to claim section 3 of the 1917 act permits.

Mr. LEE. Of course, the Senator disagrees with the opinion of these attorneys. I agree with their opinion. It is one of those instances which frequently occur of there being two interpretations of a law. There has scarcely ever been a case before any court when a number of cases on both sides have not been cited; and of course we are familiar with dissenting opinions. People may go on forever dissenting and disagreeing.

I disagree with the point made by the Senator, or the one he attempts to make, that the provision referred to would stand as a bar to the transfer of these ships. The ship that is built with the intent of being transferred would be covered by this law, but one that was not built with any such intent, as is the case of the over-age destroyers, would not be covered by that law.

Mr. LUNDEEN. Mr. President, will the Senator yield there?

Mr. LEE. I yield.

Mr. LUNDEEN. I refer to the speech delivered by the chairman of the Committee on Naval Affairs over the Columbia Broadcasting System on August 13, 1940, in which he makes this reference to Admiral Standley.

Very few, however, had the courage to sign a statement as did Admiral Standley (retired) favoring a declaration that a state of war existed between this country and Germany.

If the Senator will permit me further, I will quote a short paragraph from the speech of the chairman of the Naval Affairs Committee. He said:

Let me set at rest, also, the misleading contention that our Navy possesses a considerable number of so-called surplus destroyers for which the Navy has no immediate need. There is no warrant for such a statement. It is very far from the truth. The truth is that we have no surplus destroyers. Some of these over-age and heretofore decommissioned destroyers are being converted into fast mine layers, aircraft tenders, and antiaircraft vessels, types urgently needed in our own Navy. Many of them are operating with the fleet and on neutrality patrol.

Mr. LEE. I wish to continue the quotation from the opinion of the four attorneys, skipping part of the letter, because it is too long to be incorporated in a speech; I quote:

Nor does the Neutrality Act of November 4, 1939 (ch. 2, U. S. C., title 22, sec. 245j–1), interpose any legal bar to the release of the destroyers to the British. Under that act the vessels may lawfully be taken out of the United States to a belligerent port provided title is first transferred from the American owner. Such transfer of title could be made under the act to a foreign neutral individual or corporation.

We believe that we are entirely justified in the view that the powers granted by law to dispose of these destroyers would only be exercised where, in the considered opinion of those responsible for our national safety, their exercise would increase our powers of defense. General Pershing is high authority for the view that the transfer itself may be a vital factor in keeping war from our shores. It is quite possible that in connection with the transfer, arrangements might be made which would increase our defensive power in this hemisphere.

These destroyers are now built, armed, and equipped. It cannot by the furthest stretch of the imagination be said that they were built, armed, or equipped to the order of any belligerent, or with the intent that they should enter the service of any belligerent. If they are now released to private contractors, there is no insuperable legal barrier which stands in the way of their sale to the British in a manner compatible with the provisions of the Neutrality Act.

There is no reason for us to put a strained or unnecessary interpretation on our own statutes contrary to our own national interests. There is no reason to extend the rules of international law, beyond the limits generally accepted by other nations, to the detriment of our own country.

When vital interests of the United States are at stake, when the sentiment of the country is clear, the Government should not hesitate to exercise powers under existing law. To seek an unnecessary reaffirmation of these powers from the Congress now would be to run a serious danger of delay, and by delay possibly to endanger the vital interests of the people of the country in keeping war from our own shores.

NEW YORK, August 10, 1940.

Mr. TYDINGS. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Oklahoma yield to the Senator from Maryland?

Mr. LEE. I yield.

Mr. TYDINGS. Does the Senator feel that the opinion which he has read, not as to the propriety but as to the legality in international law of turning these ships over, would be altered if the United States Government had made one, two, or three payments on the ships as they were in progress of construction?

Mr. LEE. If the United States Government had made payments on the ships while they were in process of being constructed?

Mr. TYDINGS. In other words, if the Government had ordered these ships, and as the work progressed the Government had made first an initial payment, then a second payment, and then, for example, a third payment—in case it had made one, two, or three payments upon the ships as they were in course of construction, and to that extent, at least, had bought the ships, would the Senator feel that the opinion which he has expressed would be the same in that contingency as if the Government had made no payments at all on the ships?

Mr. LEE. Of course, the opinion from which I quoted applies only to ships which the Government has already paid for and owns. I have not explored the thought suggested by the Senator.

Mr. TYDINGS. I was talking about ships under construction.

Mr. LEE. It is very clearly admitted by these lawyers that ships under construction, as in the case of the "mosquito fleet," did come under the purview of the law and were barred by the law from transfer.

Mr. TYDINGS. Then the Senator has answered my question, because the vessels to which I had reference were the "mosquito boats," and in that case, whether they were paid for in whole or in part, as I interpret it, their transfer to a foreign government would be barred by the act.

Mr. LEE. That is the way I see it.

Mr. TYDINGS. The Senator is not dealing with that immediate matter?

Mr. LEE. No; only with the over-age destroyers which were built and paid for before any of these questions arose.

Mr. ADAMS. Mr. President——

Mr. LEE. I yield to the Senator from Colorado.

Mr. ADAMS. I heard only the concluding part of the opinion. I inquire whether there is any conflict between the position taken in this opinion and that which the United States took in its Alabama claims of some years ago against England. We collected some $15,000,000 of damages from England under an arbitration because England permitted privateers, which preyed on American commerce, to be fitted out in English yards.

Mr. LEE. It would be, of course, the first legal opinion ever offered in the history of the world if there were not conflicts of opinion. I cannot answer as to that specific case.

Mr. VANDENBERG. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. LEE. I yield.

Mr. VANDENBERG. Without attempting to pass any judgment on the issue itself, I wonder if the Senator is familiar, on the question of necessity, with the fact that Acting Secretary of the Navy Compton, saying that he spoke for himself and Admiral Stark, testified before the Senate Naval Affairs Committee in June as follows: When asked what the position of the Navy would be if we should be asked to dispose of any of our destroyers, Acting Secretary Compton, for himself and Admiral Stark, said, "Our answer would be 'No.' We would definitely recommend against it." I wonder what bearing the Senator thinks that might have on the question.

Mr. LEE. I take it the Assistant Secretary protected himself when he said it was a personal opinion. I telephoned to the Navy Department to find if any commitment or statement had been made with respect to this very question, since the legality of the argument made here is bottomed on the advice and approval of the Director of Naval Operations; and I was informed over the telephone that no such statement or commitment had been made.

Mr. VANDENBERG. The Senator will understand that this is not dealing with the legal argument. This is dealing with the question whether or not we could afford to do this as a matter of national defense.

Mr. LEE. Of course, that is a part of the legal argument because, before it would be legal, the transfer would have to be approved by the Chief of Naval Operations in a letter of approval to the chairman of the Naval Affairs Committee.

Mr. VANDENBERG. Then my understanding of the Senator's statement is that the Navy Department——

Mr. LEE. Has not taken any action on that point.

Mr. VANDENBERG. And it made no comment to the Senator about the testimony given by Acting Secretary Compton?

Mr. LEE. No comment was made with respect to that.

Mr. TYDINGS. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. LEE. I yield.

Mr. TYDINGS. I am sure the Senator realizes the distinction between a case in which we turn in old airplanes and get for those old airplanes new airplanes, and one in which we turn in old destroyers and get nothing for the destroyers. I am not dealing with the wisdom of the policy—only with the mechanics of it. In one case we take a part of our national defense, namely, an airplane, and turn it in because we thing it is obsolete or overage, but we get back for the airplane another one which is modern and up to date. In the case of the destroyers we would be turning them in without getting anything to take their place except whatever money we might obtain for the destroyers. Does not the Senator think there is a distinction between the two operations?

Mr. LEE. Mr. President, that is a matter of judgment—not necessarily a matter of law.

Mr. TYDINGS. I am not arguing the law for the moment. I am arguing the national defense of the country.

Mr. LEE. Let us suppose that in exchange for those destroyers some military advantage would be given to the United States; then the case would be the same.

Mr. TYDINGS. No; I do not think so. I think we would have to put into the picture an ingredient which is not now in it. If we were at war with Germany, then giving ships to any nation that was fighting Germany would obviously be in line with our military policy; but the formal declaration of our Government is that we are neutral—that we want to keep out of war. Therefore it seems to me that if we give these ships to England we are not neutral, certainly in spirit, and we are not acting in accordance with our formally announced military policy.

I am not taking issue with the Senator in his desire to aid England. What I am discussing is, Where will our Government stand if we do what the Senator has suggested?

Mr. LEE. I thank the Senator. It is not my purpose to go into that phase of the argment. It is based on a hypothesis. It is a good point, I grant, but it is based on a hypothesis. It deals more with judgment than with law. I simply am unwilling to strain an interpretation against what I conceive to be to the best interest of the United States. I certainly allow every other individual and every other Member of this body to make his own interpretation and follow it, and allow him also in his own judgment to disagree with me as to the best interest of the country and whether or not it is served. But this is a legal question in which one group of persons believes the United States Government is barred from releasing these old destroyers. Another group believes that legally the United States Government is not barred. I am supporting the group that believes it can be done. I want to believe that. I want to aid England.

The United States is in grave danger. If it is not, then this body has convicted itself of the most profligate extravagance in the history of the world in voting so much money for national defense. If we are in danger, then I want to have us do everything possible to strengthen our defenses and to lessen that danger; and on that basis I want to see the United States transfer those destroyers, 50 of them, and more if in the opinion of the naval officers it would not weaken our defense.

So far as injuring the feelings of Germany and Hitler is concerned, Hitler has never yet invaded a nation on the basis of his feelings. He is not a sentimentalist. He has asked himself only two questions: "First, do I want it? Second, can I take it?" He has never invaded a nation because it was unneutral, for the nations he has invaded leaned backward in order to be neutral. I am not afraid of offending Hitler's feelings, for he is a cold-blooded, calculating man who does not act upon the basis of sentimentality, but simply upon the basis of what he wants, and whether or not he is able to take it.

Mr. TYDINGS. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. LEE. I yield.

Mr. TYDINGS. I did not mean, and I am sure the Senator did not construe what I said as meaning, that I was taking issue with the Senator's right to have an opinion.

Mr. LEE. I did not so understand.

Mr. TYDINGS. I am simply searching to see where, if we should follow his suggestion, we would be.

I can sympathize with some Americans who feel that England is fighting our battle, and therefore that the logical course for us is to join in with England before she is defeated, so as to make sure that the two nations together will conquer Hitler and therefore eliminate a potential enemy. I can likewse sympathize with those who feel that the best course for the United States, if it wishes to avoid war, is to adhere to a policy of strict neutrality. I am not justifying either position; I am stating the two sides of the matter.

What I do have difficulty in doing is in taking the intermediate course which gives driblets of aid. Certainly if we accept the premise that eventually we shall have to fight Hitler, and that England is now fighting our battle, and that we are going to give them 50 old, obsolete destroyers to help them win it, if that premise is tenable and sound we ought to go all the way in now, and declare war, and send the whole Navy over so as to make that position absolutely secure, or else we ought to stay all the way out.

I do not see how we can take a course in between the two alternatives, because we have only two choices. One choice is to stay out of the war. The other choice is to go into the war; and we ought to go all the way on either side.

Understand me, if 50 obsolete destroyers are going to constitute the balance of power in the tremendous struggle which is now taking place over the English Channel and in England and the other European countries, it is a different kind of war from the one I visualize at this great distance. Therefore, I feel that my argument is reinforced by the fact that these 50 destroyers will be only a small addition to the defense of England.

Mr. LEE. But they will be an addition.

Mr. TYDINGS. Yes; that is true.

Mr. LEE. And sometimes, when the balance is very close, it takes a very little to tilt the scales to one side or the other.

Mr. TYDINGS. Why not give them some over-age battleships?

Mr. LEE. Of course, the Senator may take almost any argument, and, with plenty of suppositions and hypotheses, reduce it to a certain ultimate conclusion to which no one would agree; and that is what the Senator has done in this case.

Mr. TYDINGS. I do not want to do that. I am not trying to take suppositions; but it seems to me that if 50 obsolete ships are to be turned over to Great Britain it would be much better to turn over the whole Navy. Obviously, by turning over 50 ships, do we not say in effect that we want to augment the British force—not as individuals, not as a matter of business, not in an economic way, but as an American Government—to such an extent that she will be sure to win?

Mr. LEE. Mr. President, I wanted to make this speech.

Mr. TYDINGS. I am sorry I interrupted the Senator.

Mr. LEE. That is all right. I want the Senator to take part in it, but I also want to get in a few points before it is time to close for the day.

If the Senator from Maryland [Mr. TYDINGS] takes that attitude—and I do not know that he has done so—evidently he disagrees with the Democratic platform adopted at Chicago, and disagrees with the Republican platform adopted at Philadelphia. The Democratic platform adopted at Chicago stated:

> In self-defense and in good conscience, the world's greatest democracy cannot afford heartlessly or in a spirit of appeasement to ignore the peace-loving and liberty-loving peoples wantonly attacked by ruthless aggressors. We pledge to extend to these peoples all the material aid at our command, consistent with law and not inconsistent with the interests of our own national self-defense—all to the end that peace and international good faith may yet emerge triumphant.

Mr. TYDINGS. Mr. President, will the Senator permit me to make an observation right there?

Mr. LEE. Yes; certainly.

Mr. TYDINGS. If we are aiding our military policy by turning over 50 destroyers to Great Britain, then our military policy is to aid Great Britain. If that is our military policy, why not turn over 258 destroyers?

Mr. LEE. There is always a point of diminishing returns beyond which there is either danger, or beyond which the returns are not profitable. I would say that would be true in that case. But I do not wish to discuss that point with the Senator. We all know that there is a field in which this country can aid England and, at the same time, not step over the bounds into war, and it is that field we are occupying today. We are already committed to it. Our people have supported it at every opportunity they have had to express themselves. Both parties have gone on record for the principle of material aid, everything but men. I do not wish to debate that point with the Senator. I certainly can see the argument he makes, that one way we can go all the way, and another way we do not do anything.

I do not believe that an absolute closing of our doors is going to help us any. In fact, I believe that if we had not revised the neutrality law so as to allow our manufacturers to sell to England, England might have been beaten to her knees before now. Yet we could argue that that involves the same principle. We revised our own neutrality law so as to allow our factories to open their doors and sell to England and sell to France in order that they might combat their enemy, and at the same time it put our own factories on a mass production basis, which has stepped up and increased our own production from about 50 planes a month then to about a thousand planes a month now, which certainly has resulted in putting this country in a better state of defense than any other one thing we have done since this crisis has arisen.

Mr. LUNDEEN and Mr. TYDINGS addressed the Chair.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. CHAVEZ in the chair). Does the Senator from Oklahoma yield, and if so, to whom?

Mr. LEE. I yield first to the Senator from Minnesota.

Mr. LUNDEEN. I wish merely to call attention to a statement made on August 9 by the distinguished chairman of the Committee on Military Affairs of the Senate.

Mr. LEE. I wonder why the Senator continually refers to that. I do not dispute it.

Mr. LUNDEEN. I first read the statement of the chairman of the Committee on Naval Affairs. Now I am reading just a few words from a statement made by the chairman of the Committee on Military Affairs of the Senate.

Mr. LEE. There is no argument with the chairman of the two committees. The law provides that the Chief of Naval Operations and the Chief of Staff of the Army must refer their opinions to the chairmen of these committees.

Mr. LUNDEEN. I merely wanted to give the opinion of the chairman of the Committee on Military Affairs, which is that he does not consider that we have an adequate Navy for defense now. Then he goes on to say we need just as many ships in our Navy as we now have.

Mr. LEE. Yes.

Mr. LUNDEEN. I merely wanted that in the RECORD.

Mr. LEE. That is all right. I agree with that statement. I, myself, am in favor of that statement.

Mr. TYDINGS. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. LEE. I yield.

Mr. TYDINGS. I do not want the Senator to leave the impression that I am opposed to trade by private individuals or corporations of this country with foreign governments. I think that is perfectly proper, and if that brings wealth to our country, and enlarges our capacity for defense, all well and good. But there is a distinction between a private individual or corporation dealing with some branch of a foreign government, and a formal transfer on the part of our Government to a foreign government at war of a part of its essential defense forces, whether they be old or not. I was not arguing the economic advantage, nor am I taking issue with the Senator in his desire to help England. I was merely trying to draw the line, and to state that if we need to help England as a part of our military policy, we should go further than the 50 ships, or we should not go any distance at all, that we cannot be Roman riders, with one foot on the horse of neutrality and the other foot on the horse of war.

Mr. BONE. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. LEE. I yield.

Mr. BONE. I am not so certain that the thesis of the Senator from Maryland is absolutely correct.

Mr. TYDINGS. I have been wrong before.

Mr. BONE. We are so used to thinking that our private citizens may deal with a belligerent, and we have grown so accustomed to it from the arguments constantly dinned into our ears, that I think we fail to realize the history behind it.

Mr. TYDINGS. Will the Senator permit me to interrupt him, with the permission of the Senator from Oklahoma? Understand me, I was not saying a private citizen should or should not do what has been done. I was not discussing the merits. I was trying to draw the distinction between a private citizen or a corporation taking that action, and formal action of the Government.

Mr. BONE. There is a great moral distinction, I admit.

Mr. TYDINGS. Let me make one more statement, and then I will not interrupt the Senator further. If I desired to go over into Maryland, or anywhere else, and make a speech denouncing the head of some foreign government, I would have a right to do that under the Constitution, but if we were to pass a formal resolution in the Senate or the House of Representatives denouncing the head of a foreign government, that would be an entirely different matter. That is the distinction which I am trying to make in this debate.

Mr. LEE. Does the Senator think the Government does not have a legal right to sell these destroyers to a private corporation or an individual?

Mr. TYDINGS. We have the right not only to do that but to declare war, if we desire to do so, which goes much further. But the Hague Convention, which I believe is not now in effect, contained a specific provision that it would be an act of war if any neutral nation should turn over any ship of war to a belligerent nation.

Mr. BONE. Mr. President, if I may, I will now come back to the matter which led me to rise.

If Senators will recall history, they will remember that a private shipbuilding concern in England, the Lairds, at Birkenhead, built a ship called the Alabama. She was built for the Confederate Government as a sea raider. She was launched in England and was on the seas for a long time, until she was sunk at Cherbourg by the Kearsarge.

When the Civil War ended we filed claims against Great Britain, and the claims were sustained. They were commonly known as the Alabama claims. We sustained the claims, because we were supported by international law, which placed upon the British Government the final responsibility for allowing one of its private citizens, the Laird outfit, to build a warship for the Confederacy.

The parallel is absolutely perfect, it seems to me. I am not aware of any change in men's concept of international law which would change the status between the Alabama case and the claims growing out of her ravages on the seas and the fact that our private citizens are now selling munitions of war to one of the belligerents in the present war. If the Alabama's depredations laid the groundwork in international law for the recovery of $15,000,000 damages from the British Government, it seems to me we are at least on thin ice if we profess allegiance and loyalty to and respect for international law if we go far beyond that and, by some oblique operation—and obviously it would be an indirection—turn over to a belligerent power one-seventh of our Navy, because those destroyers which are under consideration, 50 of them, constitute approximately one-seventh of the combatant vessels of the United States Navy. If the element of obsolescence is the factor which is impressive, it may be said truthfully that about one-half of the combatant vessels of the United States Navy come within the category of obsolescence.

If one-half of 1 percent of what is charged here as to the state of our unpreparedness and the lack of ability of the Navy to defend us in a great emergency is true, then getting rid of 50 destroyers, it seems to me, would be in itself, aside from the aspects of international law, a very sad mistake.

I have been led to believe here, and I have been very much impressed by the statements made, that the United States is in a condition now where we have a threat to us from both sides, east and west, and if that threat materializes into something real, our Navy would be wholly and completely and totally inadequate to meet the crisis.

If that be true, we must hang our hat on one or the other of the horns of this dilemma—either accept as true that we are not prepared to fight on both sides of the country or else assume that we are quite prepared to meet any emergency that is thrust upon us and get rid of some of our ships. I think there is nothing in international law—for which so many feel a very profound respect—which gives us any justification whatever, by any obliquity, by any process of indirection, to take from our Navy ships that are now in active operation. It must be borne in mind that these destroyers are now in service. We cannot lift ships out of actual service in the United States Navy, with bluejackets on them who are being trained in the neutrality patrol, ships that are now a part of the Navy which is now actually in full bloom, ships that are out on the high seas, without having to go through some peculiar gyrations. We would have to indulge in some circuitous operations that would not reflect any credit on us.

If the danger is as great as the Senator says it is and our moral duty is what he says it is, we ought not to stop with 50 destroyers. There are dozens of fast ships in our Navy that are supposed to be obsolete because their age is over what is supposed to govern ships of that type. I refer now to some fast light cruisers. They are obsolete now, and they are fast, mobile ships, capable of doing convoy work quite as well as the lighter destroyers. What is the object of sending merely destroyers over there when those ships also fall into the category of obsolescence?

Mr. LEE. I thank the Senator from Washington for his contribution.

Mr. ADAMS. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Oklahoma yield to the Senator from Colorado?

Mr. LEE. Does the Senator want to ask a question or make a speech?

Mr. ADAMS. I wish to ask a question.

Mr. LEE. My inquiry was made in a facetious manner.

Mr. ADAMS. My inquiry is whether the Senator is proposing legislation?

Mr. LEE. No.

Mr. ADAMS. Because the opinion from which the Senator read specified that no legislation was necessary and the Executive had the authority to do it. That is why I wondered why the matter was brought before the Senate.

Mr. ASHURST. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. LEE. I yield.

Mr. ASHURST. The question I wish to ask the Senator may betray indolence on my part, which is not commendable. I have received several letters and telegrams from some of my constituents urging me to vote for a bill which would provide that we furnish England destroyers. I ask the able Senator from Oklahoma, who has more knowledge of the matter than I have, before what committee is the bill pending? I promise to look the matter up myself.

Mr. LEE. Mr. President, I am not speaking about a bill. I am speaking of a proposition that I believe can be accomplished within the four walls of the present law. I am not referring to a resolution. It is very plain, from the speeches made this afternoon, that if such a resolution were brought into the Senate we would debate it until Christmas. I believe this thing ought to be done, and done now. If it is going to do England any good, it ought to be done soon.

Mr. ASHURST. Mr. President, will the Senator again yield to me?

Mr. LEE. Yes; I yield.

Mr. ASHURST. The Senator is an able lawyer and an accomplished scholar. I know he has given the subject more thought than I have. Is it the Senator's opinion that the President or the Navy Department may do this without a change in the law?

Mr. LEE. It is.

Mr. ASHURST. I have respect for the Senator's opinion. I have not investigated the subject. But it seems to be true that a vast difference of opinion exists as to whether or not it may be done under the law.

Mr. LEE. That is true, as is true of practically every legal question, but I am giving my country the benefit of the doubt, as I see it, and I do not mean by that statement that those who differ with me are not as patriotic as I am.

Mr. ASHURST. I particularly wish to be frank in answering questions propounded to me by my constituents. I have been asked by some of my constituents before what committee the bill is pending, and if it is brought up for action will I vote for it. I understand that there is no such bill pending. That it is a question of departmental action or Executive action, and the able Senator from Oklahoma is of the opinion that the President has the power to sell or trade these destroyers if he so choose?

Mr. LEE. It is.

Mr. ASHURST. That is the information I sought.

Mr. LEE. Mr. President, with respect to the argument made by the two Senators who spoke previously, that we should not transfer these destroyers because we need them ourselves, and that to transfer them will weaken our defense, let me say that it is odd how some people will be influenced by the advice of so-called military experts when that advice of the military experts coincides with their own opinion. I heard it said on the floor of the Senate that the military experts have been quoted as to the ridiculousness of any foreign power crossing the ocean and reaching this country.

If we are to be influenced by the advice of the military experts, then I refer the Senate to the highest authority on this question, General Pershing and Admiral Standley, who were in charge of naval and military operations during the war, both of whom advise that it would not weaken but strengthen our defense to transfer these destroyers to England.

Furthermore, before these ships could be transferred, even under the present law, it would be necessary for the Chief of Naval Operations to give his approval, and his statement that it would not weaken our national defense.

If we are going to leave it to the military experts on the safety which the oceans give us, why not leave it to the military experts, who should be first in rank, so far as military advice is concerned, with respect to the strength of our defenses, if we transfer these destroyers to England.

Mr. President, I have heard Senators who are just as sincere as I, give utterances here lately that we are not in an emergency, that we are not in danger. Mr. President, today despotism and democracy are at death grips, and the battle for humanity is being fought now in England.

I am not one of those who say that we were fools and suckers in the war in 1917. We fought for the right of free men to govern themselves. I believe in that principle as strongly today as I did then. I do not believe that the people of this country feel that we were fools and suckers then. I think there is a great moral revulsion in this country against the unconscionable profits that were made in the war, and I think that is the source of most of the revulsion in this country against war. War does not create wealth, war destroys wealth. And when some are making money out of the war that destroys wealth, somebody else is paying double. That is the thing that the people resented.

I have not surrendered the idealism that men have a right to be free and govern themselves.

The battle for humanity is being fought now. I believe in freedom and liberty. England is over there fighting for it. We can, by the transfer of these vessels, aid a cause in which we believe. We can aid our own cause. Leave England out of it. Let us suppose you hate England. I have been impressed with the feeling that some people hate England more than they love America. I have heard vindictiveness and bitterness expressed here toward England. I do not like it, because England did not pay her debts, and she lost by it. I grant you that. But because she did not we should not hesitate to help her when it will help us more.

Leave England out of it. Suppose somebody owes you a debt and will not pay it, and his house catches on fire, and if his house burns your house will catch on fire also, and you would stand and jump up and down in your glee when you saw that fellow's house burning, happy that he was being punished because he would not pay you a debt, instead of going over and pouring water on that fire to put out the fire in order to save your own house. I make the argument not for England but for our own defense.

It is a cinch that if we escape war it is because we get ready for Hitler before he gets ready for us. I do not care what approach is made. I have heard Senators ridiculing the possibility of him coming over in a grand armada. Hitler himself said he was not going to do that. He has said, "We will not land troops like William the Conqueror." He said, "Our weapons are invisible." He said, "We require two movements, one inside and one outside. A loyal and a revolutionary one."

I am not saying how he will come, but I am saying we are all making a mistake in voting $14,000,000,000 for national defense unless there is danger. I say there is danger. The world that we knew yesterday no longer exists. We are living in another world. No matter which way this war goes, if you think we can go on in America in the easygoing American way of life which we have enjoyed under a pioneer economy, you are mistaken. If you think we can go on without feeling the repercussions of the fact that a new philosophy has overrun the Old World you are mistaken.

Does anyone think our export life will be the same? Does anyone think our tourist life will be the same? Does anyone think we can continue our easygoing life if England is beaten down? Does anyone think we can have a long Canadian border without even a popgun on it if England is beaten down? If England crumbles under the Nazi power drive which is now being made upon her, for the first time in the history of our Nation the United States will stand alone in a hostile world of totalitarian powers, the arch enemies of democracy.

It is not a pretty picture. It will mean that as long as our country exists we shall have to spend every dollar we can raise for national defense. It will mean the construction of concrete fortifications around our far-flung borders. It will mean that we shall live in a state of total fear, just as the little democracies lived before they were raided. It will mean that, in our export trade, our laborers must compete with the slave labor of the vassal states of Europe. It will mean that we shall either have war defending the Monroe Doctrine, or we shall have to abandon the Monroe Doctrine. I say it is not a pretty picture, either way we take it.

Does anyone think America can continue, with her far-flung liberties and her easygoing American way of life, in a world like that?

The world we knew yesterday has fallen; and yet some of our people say that everything is all right—"Go back to sleep; you are safe and secure." When Paul Revere, on his horse, charged through the countryside and flashed the warning, "Arm! Danger is near!" No doubt there were some who said, "He is hysterical. He is a madcap. Do not pay any attention to him." When the sexton in the tower of the Old North Church flashed the gleam of danger, telling that enemies were coming, there were those who said, "Go back to sleep. There is no danger at all." We have them today. They may be sincere, but their sincerity only adds to the effectiveness of the propaganda which they spread.

Hitler has never yet invaded a country because he was angry at it. He has invaded it because he wanted it. A peculiar thing about Hitler is that he told the world exactly what he was going to do, and up to date he has carried out his plans on schedule. The irony of it is that Hitler has never kept a promise which he made as a solemn pledge with respect to the territorial rights of other nations. He has violated all such pledges, but he has kept to the letter his intoxicated talk about total war and world domination. The irony of it is that we disregarded his dizzy talk about world domination, while we believed his solemn pledges with respect to the rights of others.

Mr. BONE. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. PEPPER in the chair). Does the Senator from Oklahoma yield to the Senator from Washington?

Mr. LEE. I yield.

Mr. BONE. I take it from that appraisal of Mr. Hitler that we are to assume that in one instance he is a liar, and in the next instance he is telling the truth.

Mr. LEE. That is correct.

Mr. BONE. When are we to believe him? He is a blackguard, a bulldoser, and a liar. He carries out part of his statements and disregards his promises.

Mr. LEE. We are to believe him when he says his plans include America. We are to believe him when he says he intends to make a new Germany in Latin America.

Mr. BARKLEY. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. LEE. I yield.

Mr. BARKLEY. As I understand the position of the Senator from Oklahoma, it is that we can rely on Hitler's threats, but not on his promises.

Mr. LEE. We can rely on anything that will contribute to world domination by Hitler, and disregard anything that will in any way hinder him in his mad ambition for world domination.

Hitler has told us what he would do, and up to date he has carried it out to the letter. He said to the small nations of Europe, "My soldiers will appear suddenly in your capitals. They will be uniformed and armed. No one will stop them." I am reminded of the amazing betrayal of Norway, when the Norway police led the Nazi troops through the capital of Norway, acting, of course, under false orders because of the confusion.

Hitler has violated all orthodox military formulas. Every time, before an invasion, military experts said, "It cannot be done"; but he did it; and some military experts still deny it. Would anyone have believed, 2 years ago, that Hitler would have done what he has done? Not at all. We laughed at his statements as dizzy and ridiculous. It is said today that it is ridiculous to believe that Hitler can threaten the security of the United States. We are told, "Look at our oceans!" Mr. President, I say that an ocean may be an avenue of attack as well as an insulation against attack. The same Atlantic Ocean which has been our protection as long as the British fleet rode its waves will be our vulnerable point of attack if that fleet falls into the hands of the Nazi leader.

Military experts laughed at the idea of using parachute troops. They ridiculed it; but Mr. Hitler used them. Military experts ridiculed the idea of Hitler having an invincible military machine. All the economic experts have been telling us for 5 years that Hitler would crumble economically. Five years ago they said that he could not last a year.

At the end of each year they said that economically Germany was a shell. They predicted the collapse and failure of Hitler all along; and yet his predictions for world domination have gone on schedule, and they are still going on schedule.

The argument is made, "If he cannot get across 22 miles of the English Channel, how in the world can he cross 3,000 miles of ocean?" The channel has its advantages as well as its disadvantages. In the case of the channel, the attack and the defense are concentrated. It is easier to defend 50 miles than a thousand miles of coast.

I used to play football. When we got on to the signals of the opposing team, and knew where the attack was coming, we strengthened the line at that point. That can be done when the line is not too long. But when we have the Atlantic coast and the Pacific coast, and do not know where the enemy is to strike, and we have the possibility of Nazi air bases in Latin American countries, and all the other surprises of which Adolf Hitler is capable, do not tell me that we are safe and secure.

Mr. Hitler has done the impossible, according to the military experts. They said that Hitler's invasion of Norway would be the greatest military mistake he could possibly make; but Hitler did it, and it did not turn out to be a mistake. Military experts said to the Belgians, "The Albert Canal is your defense. It would be ridiculous for opposing troops to try to cross it. You could mow them down"; but the Nazis crossed it, and they were not mowed down.

Then the military experts said to France, "Go to sleep. There is your Maginot Line." The Maginot Line stands there today high and dry.

Then the military experts said, "France has the greatest army in the world." Only a few months ago I believed that myself. I did not believe the Germans could cross the Maginot Line; but they flanked the Maginot Line and destroyed the French Army, the greatest army on the face of the earth—so I thought.

The Germans have not yet failed to cross the English Channel. My fear is against my hope and prayer, but my fear is that they have not yet unleashed their drive on Britain. The British Fleet stands between America and the greatest juggernaut of destruction which has ever been devised.

Hitler has used another thing which no other military leader ever used, and that is the "fifth column." Did any other military leader ever use that before? No. Did any other military leader ever use propaganda to the extent that Hitler has used it? For the first time in the history of the world this military leader sets up a propaganda machine and calls it such. I think perhaps America, with a little more time, might resist and ward off, at least for a while, the military attacks of Hitler; but we cannot stand up against the Nazi "woo." When Nazi "woo" is pitched at America, I fear that we cannot resist it.

Would anyone have believed it possible to fool the rest of the world with the same trick 8 times? Yet that is what Hitler has done. He made love to 10 countries, and he ravaged 1. He made love to 9 countries and raided another. He has been a master at dividing them and taking them 1 at a time, playing both ends against the middle and destroying the one marked for slaughter. He started outside operations and inside operations. He made use of propaganda. No one has ever used it to the extent to which he has used it.

First he told the world, "All I want is the Sudetenland." He took the Sudetenland, and as soon as he got it he said, "All I want now is Czechoslovakia." Would anyone have thought that he could have worked the same trick twice? And yet the poor old man with the umbrella and poor old Daladier, who now is a pitiful example of what happens to appeasers, swallowed his story—hook, line, and sinker. When he said, "All I want now is Czechoslovakia," there were a million men ready to die at the front; a million men who that morning had kissed their wives and babies good-bye, expecting their mutilated bodies to mark the border line where the little country of Czechoslovakia had once stood; and yet Hitler fooled the world again. Then after the Germans invaded Poland and blasted it from the face of the earth, would you have believed that anybody could be fooled again by this man, who broke every promise to respect the rights of others; who blasted Poland and left nothing but charred ruins to show where there had once been a thriving and a happy republic?

When it worked again, he goes over through his "fifth columns" to Norway and Denmark, and he works on them inside; and then, when he is ready, he marches into those countries without firing a gun.

Can it be done again? No; it cannot be done again; but just as soon as he strengthens himself in those two countries he goes down into the lowlands. He goes to the Dutch, and he works on them inside and outside, and he starts across the lowlands. We hold our breath. We say, "He will be stopped at the Albert Canal." He crossed the Albert Canal on a bridge without the loss of a man, so I am informed. They had dynamite there. They had kept it there for 2 years, ready to blow up that bridge; and yet his "fifth columnists," inside workers, got to them, and the dynamite was never exploded, and the Germans crossed on that bridge.

We said, "Well, he cannot take France"; but he did. He worked outside and he worked inside, and he fooled England until the eleventh hour. He fooled England with the Nazi "woo." Has he thrown it to the world again?

Thirty days ago I saw Senators here vote billions of dollars for defense without batting an eye; and then he commenced throwing the Nazi "woo" at America. He commenced throwing over here his appeasement program; and I even understand that a once great hero of this country got on the radio and said to the people of America, "Close your eyes to the betrayals of this man. Forget about his ruthless invasion of Poland. Forget all of his broken promises. Forget his destruction of France. Forget his plans to put the Gestapo over all humanity. Forget all of his plans of total war and domination, and reach out, America, and take that bloody, slippery hand of Adolf Hitler in cooperation with Germany. Cooperate with Germany," and thereby condone the bloodiest butcher who ever walked the face of the earth!

When Tamerlane finished his pyramid of 75,000 human skulls, and stood at the gate of Damascus glittering in steel, it seemed that human butchery had reached its zenith; but this human butcher, the beast of Berlin, has outstripped Tamerlane and all of the others, Attila, the Scourge of God, and all others; and yet we are told to reach out and take that hand, dripping with human blood, and cooperate, and thereby condone his destruction of human liberty in the world!

I say today democracy and despotism are at death grips; and I say as little as we can do is to send the few over-age ships over there to aid England. The Germans threw the Nazi "woo" at America, and what effect has it had? Since then, some Senators—I do not challenge their patriotism, but I want to show you what effect this propaganda has had—some Senators who voted billions of dollars for defense are now saying, "There is no emergency. There is no danger. We are safe and secure, with 3,000 miles of ocean between us." They are saying, "We can defend ourselves. There is no danger."

Is the Nazi "woo" having effect? The same Senators only a short time ago voted for appropriations because they were scared then; they were worried then; but the Nazi "woo"—what was it? Why, Mr. Hitler came out, and he drew the curtains, and he said to the world, "I am offering England peace. I want England to accept my peace offer. England, clasp my hand. It is a little slippery, yes; but clasp it in a friendly grip of peace, and you may have peace—at my price, of course, which means slavery, which means a furtherance of my program. Take my terms of peace, or else you are responsible for all of these dead and charred nations." Then the rest of the world began to see Mr. Hitler not as a bloody butcher but as a kind, charitable man who wants to save England from the horrors of war which he was then cooking up in the ovens of Germany for this "blitzkrieg," and we are falling for it again.

I say, America, are we going to stay asleep and allow this fellow to carry out his plans in South America? They have already been disclosed. Thousands of arms have been unearthed down in Argentina, where the Nazis are already preparing. They have increased their consularships in America. What for? Is there any need of that? Is there any justification for it?

The F. B. I. tell us that they are flooded with cases of espionage and inside "fifth column" work in this country. Are we going to believe that? But there is Mr. Hitler, who says, "England is responsible for this war."

And now they have come out with a last bit of propaganda. They picture the poor, starving peoples of Europe whom they themselves are starving, and they have always played Americans for suckers. They say, "America will feed our victims if we just show a few pictures of starving babies in the newspapers of America. The big-hearted Americans, who are charitable and kindly, will feed these victims of ours, and they will feel better, and that will strengthen the morale of Germany. That will build up the esprit de corps of our Army. That will make us strong. That will discourage England. That will make England weak. She has one weapon, that of strangulation by her embargo. It will break the backbone of that embargo, and these victims will not feel so badly." But if, on the other hand—and I say it with a breaking heart—if, on the other hand, these poor souls who believed Hitler's line of appeasement, who were willing to accept his terms of peace, crawl up and their starving carcasses lie at the doorstep of Germany, where they have a right by every law of man and God to lie—if they do that, I say that will break the spirit and the backbone of Germany quicker than anything else that can happen. If the buzzards sail over the decomposed bodies of starving human beings in Europe, I say that will break the backbone of Germany. I say it is breaking the people's hearts to think of it in that way, but I do not know what else to do. It is either that or break the stranglehold that England has on Hitler, break England's only weapon, and then lay the world at the feet of the greatest monster that has been created.

Mr. President, I hope we can transfer these ships to the British. I believe it can be done legally in the interest and defense of America. What navy we have would not defend us for a great length of time, but by transferring these destroyers to England might turn the tide. It means a pooling of strength. It is useless to deceive ourselves. What other enemies are on the horizon today? What other enemies are there? Whom are we preparing for? Who was to blame for our voting the billions we have voted but Hitler? If the Nazi machine were destroyed today, we could repeal our appropriations for national defense.

We could adjourn and go home. Why are our people going to be taxed? Because of Hitler. Because of Hitler we are going to have to ask our boys to train and work in the Army. Who is to blame for all that? There is only one power that is to blame for it, and that is the Nazi power. It is useless to deceive ourselves; and if the Nazis can be stopped in Europe, that is the place to stop them.

I love peace. I hate war with every atom and fiber of my being. I was not in the front-rank trenches in the World War, but I was right behind them, ready to be ordered up, and I remember seeing the boys as they came back with their mangled bodies. I took a vow in my heart against war. I hate it. It is not a choice of war or peace with us. This thing is not a placid lake which we have the choice of getting in or staying out of. It is a raging fire that is coming closer to America all the time. Every time one of the gallant eagles of England falls out of the sky with a broken wing, the war is one man and one plane closer to the United States.

It is because I want to keep the war away that I plead that we do what we can legally to stop the war over there. Some of the best legal minds say it can be done. Let us give ourselves the benefit of the doubt and transfer the ships.

The blood of American youth is so precious, so much more precious than the material wealth of this country, that I am willing if necessary to use all of that material wealth in order to prevent war from coming to our shores. I think the proposal to turn these ships to England is a step which will help to do it, and I plead that we do it.

I believe that if it had not been for our policy of aiding England by the revision of our neutrality law, England by now might have been beaten to her knees and the Nazis might by this time be knocking at our very gates. Therefore I think that through our policy of aiding England we have been able thus far to keep war out of America. Our only chance to escape war is to get ready for Hitler before he gets ready for us, and taking the step proposed would at least give us more time to prepare. I thank the Senate.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. PEPPER in the chair). The occupants of the galleries must, under the rules of the Senate, refrain from manifestations of approval or disapproval.

NATIONAL DEFENSE—RESOLUTIONS OF AMERICAN LEGION OF MINNESOTA

Mr. SHIPSTEAD. Mr. President, I wish to read to the Senate an excerpt from resolutions on the question of defense adopted at a recent convention of the American Legion of the State of Minnesota. I read from the Minneapolis Star-Journal of August 13, 1940:

Without a word of debate or protest the convention approved recommendations of a special national-defense committee, which called for a universal selective-service program, but advocated Congress provide necessary equipment and quarters before conscripting the Nation's manpower.

The same recommendation demanded official Washington "be urged to keep the American public truthfully advised as to the status of our defense plans for future expansion."

The resolution emphasized immediate need of the United States is production of arms and military equipment, after pointing out that the Government, at the present time, is not prepared to equip and maintain such a greatly increased armed force.

Other resolutions adopted with relation to national-defense plans and conscription were:

Recommending that the Nation build a defense system sufficient to resist invasion.

Urging Congress to adopt immediately a program to have on hand continually a sufficient supply of all raw and manufactured materials.

In my opinion, this is a sensible, sound, and patriotic program.

MANGANESE

Mr. CHAVEZ. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to insert in the RECORD an extract from questions asked by a radio commentator and the answers given by a member of the National Defense Advisory Commission, in reference to an essential and strategic material—namely, manganese.

I should also like to insert in the RECORD an analysis of some of the ores as they occur in New Mexico, referring especially to manganese.

I also ask leave to insert in the RECORD a copy of Senate bill 4008, which has alrcady passed the Senate, and which refers also to manganese.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection?

There being no objection, the matters were ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

The following is an extract from questions which were asked by radio commentators and answered by members of the National Defense Advisory Commission in a broadcast over the four radio networks from Washington, August 8, 1940, giving remarks of Mr. Edward R. Stettinius, Jr., in charge of the Raw Materials Division of the National Defense Commission:

"Mr. WARNER. Of course, you must encounter numerous difficulties, Mr. Stettinius. Could you give us an example?

"ANSWER. Yes. A very practical difficulty, for instance, involves one of our sources of high-grade manganese—an indispensable alloy for the manufacture of steel. It is in Brazil. Transportation to that source is inadequate, and to get the supplies we need, a railroad in Brazil will have to be rebuilt. That is typical of the kind of problems we face."

An act (S. 4008) to authorize the Reconstruction Finance Corporation to make loans for the development of deposits of strategic and critical minerals which in the opinion of the Corporation would be of value to the United States in time of war, and to authorize the Reconstruction Finance Corporation to make more adequate loans for mineral developmental purposes

Be it enacted, etc., That section 14 of the act entitled "An act relating to direct loans for industrial purposes by Federal Reserve banks, and for other purposes," approved June 19, 1934, as amended, is amended to read as follows:

"SEC. 14. The Reconstruction Finance Corporation is authorized and empowered to make loans upon sufficient security to recognized and established corporations, individuals, and partnerships engaged in the business of mining, milling, or smelting ores. The Reconstruction Finance Corporation is authorized and empowered also to make loans to corporations, individuals, and partnerships engaged in the development of a quartz ledge, or vein, or other ore body, or placer deposit, containing gold, silver, or tin, or gold and silver, or any strategic or critical mineral which in the opinion of the Reconstruction Finance Corporation would be of value to the United States in time of war, when, in the opinion of the Reconstruction Finance Corporation, there is sufficent reason to believe that, through the use of such loan in the development of a lode, ledge, or vein, or mineral deposit, or placer gravel deposit, there will be developed a sufficient quantity of ore, or placer deposits of a sufficient value to pay a profit upon mining operations: Provided, That not to exceed $20,000 shall be loaned to any corporation, individual, or partnership for such development purposes; except that not in excess of $40,000 in the aggregate may be loaned to any corporation, individual, or partnership for such purposes, if such corporation, individual, or partnership has expended funds previously obtained from the Reconstruction Finance Corporation for such purposes in such manner as to justify an additional loan for such purposes: Provided further, That there shall not be allocated or made available for such development loans a sum in excess of $10,000,000."

Mr. CHAVEZ. Mr. President, the answers given by the member of the Advisory Defense Commission have reference to manganese and the production of manganese outside the United States. The statements I have inserted refer to the production of manganese in the State of New Mexico. The answers given by the member of the Commission refer to the fact that a railroad will have to be built to mines outside the United States.

The manganese to which I have referred, the New Mexico manganese, is in the immediate area traversed by the Atchison, Topeka & Santa Fe Railroad and the Southern Pacific Railroad. Those two railroads have more to do with keeping our public schools running the year around than anything I know of within the State of New Mexico. It appears only reasonable that home products should be developed to the extent that those who invest their money shall at least have protection for their investments. If manganese is developed within the limits of the United States, in the West—New Mexico, Arizona, Wyoming, and in other States—it will mean taking thousands of people off the relief rolls, and they will get into private employment.

Mr. LUNDEEN. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. CHAVEZ. I yield.

Mr. LUNDEEN. I should like to include in the States mentioned my native State of South Dakota, in which there are large deposits of manganese.

Mr. CHAVEZ. I am sure there are probably 20 States of the 48 where manganese could be produced. I know it is produced in the State of Arizona.

Mr. ASHURST. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. CHAVEZ. I yield.

Mr. ASHURST. After an investigation which lasted some years, I am able to say with authority that manganese exists, not in 20 States, but in 30 States, and in many, if not most of those States, there is a greater percentage of metallic manganese in the ore than in the Brazilian ores.

The Bureau of Mines in a recent bulletin states that when the ore is below 40 percent it is regarded as low grade. Nearly all the Brazilian ores are below 40, and most all the American ores are above 48. But manganese is used, not wholly, but largely, in the manufacture of steel. Steel cannot be made without it. The steel companies—and I make no criticism—have preferred to buy manganese where they can get it the cheapest. The steel companies have worked for years to bring about free trade in manganese and a very high tariff on the products of their mills. That is human selfishness. It may be enlightened selfishness; but that is what has happened.

Mr. CHAVEZ. Mr. President, with reference to manganese, it is a fact that it is now essential and that the Government desires to have it. It is also a fact that we have it within the United States. Moreover, if we could only be allowed to develop the manganese industry now, in this hour of need, we would take thousands of people off the relief rolls. So far as my State is concerned, there are 18,000 people on the relief rolls. If we meet the manganese needs of our country only, it will mean taking three or four thousand of those people off the relief rolls. It appears to me that, as a matter of national defense, it would be better to put human beings into private employment, so that the money being paid out for relief could be used for other purposes.

Mr. ASHURST. Mr. President, will the Senator yield further?

Mr. CHAVEZ. I yield.

Mr. ASHURST. I had not expected to refer to the matter, and do so rather reluctantly, but I call attention to the enormously large deposits of high-grade manganese ore in Arizona. It is a fact that in northwestern Arizona, adjacent to Boulder Dam, where enormous quantities of hydroelectric energy are generated, the manganese ores in the mines could be what we call "beneficiated," or treated, and the process of beneficiating those ores would employ, if not thousands of idle men, hundreds of idle men, at good wages.

Mr. President, mankind is controlled very largely by habit. Habit is the strongest thing in the world. Epithets, phrases, also influence mankind, and mankind is not free from delusions. One of the most inveterate and deadly delusions under which our country has labored for a century and a half is that it is wise and patriotic to import goods fabricated and manufactured in foreign countries, and that thereby we stimulate friendship. Such a policy does not stimulate friendship. Every nation buys where it can obtain the required goods the cheapest. To sum it up in a phrase that is cynical but true, nations are free traders after they have succeeded in protecting their own interests.

Mr. CHAVEZ. I am sure the Senator from Arizona is correct. I am a free trader with respect to everything but copper, lumber, coal, and everything that New Mexico produces.

Mr. ASHURST. That is a frank statement, and I admire the Senator from New Mexico for it. Others are not so frank. I am not referring to Senators. Senators are always frank, but others are not.

Mr. CHAVEZ. Mr. President, I may add one more thought along the line suggested by the Senator from Arizona. Within the past year or two this body and the other House have been good enough to appropriate several million dollars in order to provide for the development of electrical energy at the Elephant Butte Dam of the Rio Grande Irrigation District. It is a completed project, which can supply cheap power in developing manganese. It is within 60 miles of one of the largest manganese-ore areas in the entire State. It is within 100 miles of another area just as large. We have within immediate reach of the source of supply of manganese, enough power to utilize the manganese in this hour of need.

But aside from the fact that we need manganese, and need it now, aside from the fact that we can get this essential war material now within the United States, is it not reasonable to expect that we should all be thinking, also, of trying to get people off relief and into private employment? Do not the leaders of the Nation, industrial, political, and administrative, all wish for the time to come when industry will let loose its capital, and invest it in some kind of enterprises which will take men off relief and enable them to regain their self-respect, so that they may say, "I am creating something that is advantageous for my country in its hour of need, and I, by myself, am earning a living without depending on Congress or on those in Washington who may feel sorry for me." The average American does not want anyone to feel sorry for him. He wants to work out his own salvation. He wants to save himself if only the opportunity can be given him.

Mr. President, I believe it is really bad that in these times we should be thinking about getting manganese ore from Russia or elsewhere, so long as we have it within the United States. We can organize a manganese industry that will help to pay the taxes imposed upon our people.

I believe that the Senators who today have spoken about the manganese industry are on the right track, and that they are giving to the country information which is sound. I think the Government should interest itself more in the production of manganese, not only in New Mexico but everywhere in the United States.

AUTHORITY TO RECEIVE HOUSE MESSAGE DURING RECESS

Mr. LUNDEEN obtained the floor.

Mr. BARKLEY. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. LUNDEEN. I yield.

Mr. BARKLEY. I understand the Senator from Minnesota desires to address the Senate for some length of time. I am compelled to leave the Chamber now. For that reason I ask unanimous consent that the order which I send to the desk may be entered.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The order will be read.

The legislative clerk read as follows:

Ordered, That during the recess or adjournment following today's session, the Secretary of the Senate be authorized to receive a message from the House of Representatives relative to the joint resolution (S. J. Res. 286) to strengthen the common defense and to authorize the President to order members and units of Reserve components and retired personnel of the Regular Army into active military service, and that the joint resolution be printed showing the House amendments numbered.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and the order is entered.

EXECUTIVE SESSION

Mr. BARKLEY. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate proceeded to the consideration of executive business.

EXECUTIVE REPORT OF A COMMITTEE

Mr. McKELLAR, from the Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads, reported favorably the nominations of sundry postmasters.

IN THE ARMY

Mr. SHEPPARD. Mr. President, from the Committee on Military Affairs, I report favorably sundry Army nominations which were received by the Senate yesterday. Inasmuch as these nominations are entirely of routine character, in order to save a considerable amount of printing, I ask unanimous consent for their present consideration and confirmation.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and the nominations are confirmed.

Mr. SHEPPARD. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the President be at once advised of the confirmation of these nominations, and that the list of names of the persons confirmed be not again printed in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, but that proper reference be made to the pages on which their nominations appear.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered; and the President will be notified.

If there be no further reports of committees, the clerk will state the nominations on the calendar.

NAVY DEPARTMENT

The legislative clerk read the nomination of James V. Forrestal, of New York, to be Under Secretary of the Navy.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, the nomination is confirmed.

POSTMASTERS

The legislative clerk proceeded to read sundry nominations of postmasters.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, the nominations of postmasters are confirmed en bloc.

IN THE NAVY

The legislative clerk proceeded to read sundry nominations in the Navy.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, the nominations in the Navy are confirmed en bloc.

IN THE MARINE CORPS

The legislative clerk proceeded to read sundry nominations in the Marine Corps.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, the nominations in the Marine Corps are confirmed en bloc.

That completes the calendar.

AUTHORIZATION TO REPORT BILLS, ETC., DURING RECESS

The Senate resumed the consideration of legislative business.

Mr. BARKLEY. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that during the recess following today's session any committee of the Senate may be authorized to submit reports on bills, resolutions, and nominations.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

ORDER FOR RECESS TO MONDAY

Mr. BARKLEY. Mr. President, I have one more request. Because of certain situations to which the Senator from Oregon [Mr. MCNARY], the minority leader, has called my attention, an understanding has been reached that we shall recess from today until Monday. Therefore I ask unanimous consent that at the conclusion of today's business the Senate stand in recess until 11 o'clock a. m. on Monday next.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection?

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Kentucky yield to the Senator from Nebraska?

Mr. BARKLEY. I yield.

Mr. NORRIS. I do not intend to object, although I am very sorry that the Senator makes this request. I know the harmony that exists between the Senator from Kentucky [Mr. BARKLEY] and the Republican leader [Mr. MCNARY]. It is a matter for congratulation. No Senator more than I would like to accommodate the Senator from Oregon. Yet it seems to me that long adjournments or recesses, taken at a time when we ought to proceed with the business before the Senate, are rather out of place. I am getting weary of trying to stay here through the hot weather. I do not see the necessity for adjourning or recessing for several days to try to accommodate a few Senators who wish to be absent. We have been doing that right along. However, it seems to me to be uncalled for and unnecessary. As I have said, however, I do not wish to interpose myself as an objector to the request, but I wish to let the RECORD show that someone at least protested against it.

Mr. MCNARY. Mr. President, that statement calls for but a word. We have adjourned on several occasions to meet conditions that have arisen. A number of Senators on the Republican side desire to visit Elwood, Ind., and attend the ceremonies on Saturday. In order to accommodate them I asked the able majority leader to request a recess from today until Monday, which he has kindly consented to do. I hesitated to make the request, but I thought it was perfectly proper. We recessed for the Republican Convention and for the Democratic Convention. In any event, we shall probably recess over Saturday, and I am asking for only 1 additional day. I think the request is reasonable. I hope no one will feel offended by it. I very seldom make a request. I am in attendance every day. I intend to be in Washington for the remainder of the week, but I make this request out of courtesy and out of consideration for the convenience of Senators who wish to be absent.

I take this opportunity of expressing my appreciation for the thoughtful attitude on the part of the able leader, who is proverbially and instinctively thoughtful.

Mr. BARKLEY. I thank the Senator.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to the request of the Senator from Kentucky? The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

FARMER-LABOR PARTY—A POLITICAL PATTERN FOR AMERICA

Mr. LUNDEEN. Mr. President, we have listened to Democratic and Republican doctrines. We have heard the platforms and programs of both parties. The national conventions and the speeches delivered there have found a place in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD. Yet unemployment continues. The crisis is still with us. It seems to me that at this time a few words about the Farmer-Labor Party of Minnesota are timely and proper.

Let me say in that connection that at the present time I happen to be the only representative of the Farmer-Labor Party in the United States Senate. I therefore feel that I should present its creed, its program, and its platform for the information of the Senate and the Nation.

HISTORY AND PURPOSES OF THE MINNESOTA POLITICAL MOVEMENT OF WORKERS, FARMERS, AND INDEPENDENT BUSINESS AND PROFESSIONAL GROUPS

The Farmer-Labor Party is the answer of the common people to the challenge of monopoly and special privilege.

Although there are political efforts recorded in the history of this country of movements similar to that which took place in the Northwest, these were feeble and sporadic, and lacked staying powers. But they were straws in the wind and pointed toward the formation of a great liberal party, a party destined to see its birth in Minnesota. Our party represents the first successful political venture of its kind. It is no longer an experiment—it has come of age and points the way to the political future of America.

THE AMERICAN WAY

The Farmer-Labor Party is the most truly American party in the political arena today. It combats the forces which are destroying the American way of life—the way of life as the fathers expressed it in the Declaration of Independence—the right of the people to "life, liberty, and the pursuit of happiness," and the guaranties contained in the Bill of Rights—the way of life as the immortal Lincoln conceived it, "government of the people, by the people, and for the people."

AMERICAN WAY OF LIFE CHALLENGED

Only one deliberately blind—one who does not want to see the truth—will dispute that the American way of life is gravely challenged today, not only by foreign ideologies, but by powerful forces within our own land.

The fact that there are more than 10,000,000 able-bodied men and women in America today, anxious and willing to do useful work but unable to obtain employment, is evidence of how serious this challenge is. The fact that those who till the soil and raise the foodstuffs to feed our Nation are unable to attain even a semblance of economic security is evidence of the same thing. If we seek for further proof, it is to be found in the lack of opportunities afforded our youth; in the slow economic strangulation of the independent merchant in unfair competition with chains and monopolies, and in our inability to create a standard of living even remotely commensurate with the vast wealth we are able to produce.

OLD PARTIES HAVE FAILED

Neither of the old political parties has shown either the willingness or the ability to meet this challenge—to tackle the problem in any but a superficial way. This is principally so because the forces depriving the people of opportunity exercise positions of power within these parties.

There is an old proverb which says, "He who pays the piper calls the tune." Wall Street has been paying the piper of both the old political parties most of the time, and the tune that Wall Street calls is not sweet music to the ears of the common people.

PROGRESSIVE ASCENDENCY TEMPORARY

It is true that occasionally the progressive forces in one of the old parties may gain the ascendency, but the control they exercise during such periods is neither absolute nor is it over any great period of time.

The progressive program cannot be carried out in full. Compromises with the conservatives and reactionaries invariably result. Ultimately, the latter gain the upper hand.

It is only when the common people obtain control through a political movement of their own that their aspirations will be advanced in accordance with the finest traditions and ideals of our American democracy. That is the mission of the Farmer-Labor Party of Minnesota.

FARMER AND WORKER TRADITION

The tradition of joint farmer and worker political action—the Minnesota tradition—is of long duration.

Ignatius Donnelly—that leader of so many of the people's struggles of the last century—persistently urged farmers and city toilers to join hands in independent political action. Though he made his most fiery appeals for joint action in 1893, the tradition of the bond between these two groups of the producing classes in Minnesota had already had a dignified history.

In 1892 James B. Weaver, leading the Peoples' Party, polled more than 1,000,000 votes for President, there being no woman suffrage and only one-half of our present population.

FIGHT BEGUN BY GRANGE

This Minnesota tradition goes back to the days of the Grange, the great farmers' reform movement of the seventies, which was directed against the excessive rates and the unregulated piracy of the railroad speculators. This movement was begun by small farmers, eager to reach their markets without having to turn over their profits to the powerful railroad combination in the form of freight charges.

The Grange was developed by a Minnesota farmer with a genius for organization—Oliver H. Kelley, of Elk River. From his Sherburne County farm Kelley aroused his fellow farmers into taking the lead against the growing monopolies, of which the railways were the worst offenders against the public interest in the West. The Grange farmers demanded readjustment of the tax burden so that the trusts and corporations would pay their share; regulation of freight rates, and an increase in the currency supply.

ADOPT POLITICAL ACTION

The Grange went directly into politics with its own State party, and was successful in securing the balance of power in the legislatures of the early seventies. These bodies passed the first State laws regulating the railroads, and the debates on this legislation did much to acquaint the public with the true facts concerning railway stock watering and land grabbing.

The lasting effect of the Grange agitation was assured when the State supreme court ruled, in 1876, that the legislature had the right to regulate rates and fares. In this outcome the Grangers could hail a real victory, because the railroads had defied regulation.

REASON FOR GRANGE FAILURE

But because of the rather restricted views of the Grangers and the uncertain fortunes of their political parties on the national field, this early farmers' movement faded away, until there were no locals left. Today the Grange has again found its place among the rural organizations, but in no way comparable to the early years.

The chief lessons of the Granger years were that farmers, combined in their own political organization, could be the controlling factor in a State, and that they voiced the demands of all the common people against the oppression of Wall Street.

These lessons formed the basis for broad, political action.

FARMERS UNITED

Thus we find that liberal leaders such as Ignatius Donnelly wisely refused to let the farmers disperse. More action, more reforms, more demands for a proper share in the fruits of life, should be the aim, Donnelly insisted.

With new oppressors in the form of grain gamblers funneling off the living of growers, and the great employers resisting all efforts by workingmen to make a decent living for their families, it was only natural that the people turned to independent politics again. The records of the two major political parties made it plain enough that nothing was to be gained by supporting the politicians in those camps—politicians who were already in the camp of the enemy.

LABOR JOINS MILITANT FARMERS

The eighties therefore found the farmers back in the political field, and this time they were joined by the workers in the factory, foundry, mine, forest, and upon the boats and railroads. The farmers organized themselves into the Farmers' Alliance. The workers formed great industrial unions and the pioneer national federation of labor, the knights of labor.

These two great groups, who produce virtually all our wealth, discovered that they were both being ground down by identical forces, and that these forces had pretty much to say about how the Government should be conducted and for whose special benefit it should be operated. Whether it was the railroad speculators or the grain gamblers who fleeced the farmers, or the open-shoppers who fought unionism, they were part and parcel of the same group who manipulated Government to keep the people down.

At first the two groups of producers backed whoever pledged himself to the farmer-worker program of change, and in this way came to control the legislature of 1891. But so many of the legislators thus supported betrayed those who elected them that the farmers and workers had to form their own State party in 1892.

THE FARMERS' ALLIANCE

In those Congressional Districts, mainly rural, the Farmers' Alliance was the chief political factor, in the cities the labor unions became powerful forces to reckon with. Thus the farmers of western Minnesota sent the Norwegian immigrant farmer, Kittel Halvorson, to Congress as their own candidate, and the farmers of southwestern Minnesota got behind another Scandinavian tiller of the soil, Haldor Boen, sending him to Congress also.

In the city districts, many reactionary Republicans were turned out of office and replaced by liberal Democrats.

Finally, in 1896, there arose from the ranks of the progressives a great liberal, and one of Minnesota's foremost men, John Lind. Lind made the race for the governorship on the Democratic ticket, with the support of the People's Party. He lost by a scant handful of votes against the old guard Republican machine, and sent a thrill of hope throughout the State.

In 1898 he again made the race and this time carried all before him. In that election Governor Lind received the enthusiastic support of the veterans of the Spanish-American War in whose Army he so ably served. This was a great victory for the Populist movement, the farmer-labor movement of our fathers, and the boys in blue.

CAMPAIGNS REPRESENTED CAUSES

Political campaigns during those years were more than simply contests between personalities.

The people were thoroughly aroused to the menace of immensely wealthy trusts controlled by a few bankers, which, in turn, controlled the affairs not only of cities and States but even of the Nation's greatest deliberative bodies, as well as the living conditions of millions of Americans.

The Grangers and the People's Party were the true predecessors of the Farmer-Labor Party of our time. They knew that they were fighting a financial machine that threatened to gain a stranglehold on the Nation. They were opposed to rule by a financial oligarchy; they wanted a different mode of life, in which there was employment and security for all. It was the early phase of a struggle that is still continuing today. It is surprising that they saw so clearly.

WORKED FOR POPULIST CAUSE

Among the prominent Minnesotans who worked to make the Populist movement an instrument of change were the late Sydney M. Owen, farm journal publisher; the late Thomas Meighan; Sylvanus A. Stockwell, that grand old man of Minnesota liberalism; and the other veteran of 50 years on the firing line, Victor E. Lawson, Willmar publisher.

The chief objective of the Populist revolt failed, however. The trusts, under the watchful care of the McKinley-Hanna Republican machine, grew even more immense. The turn of the century saw the speculators and profiteers firmly in the saddle, the people's movement crushed. It was crushed by fusion with the Democratic Party in 1896 and 1900, and the illusion of following a silver tongue into the wilderness of old party promises. They were swamped and submerged, never to rise again.

The new attack of the reactionaries was upon the trade-union movement, which had re-formed into the American Federation of Labor.

The big industrialists threw open their immense reserves to finance a great open-shop campaign, which had for its object the complete destruction of the trade-unions. They had the effrontery to call this the campaign for "the American plan."

NEW CHAMPIONS ARISE IN NATION

The farmers' organizations were already routed, and nothing seemed to stand between the big financiers and industrialists and absolute domination of the Nation's life but the labor unions. The arrogance of Wall Street was so great that the people again began to stir angrily. In the West new voices took up the cry for economic freedom.

Leading this new movement was the late great "Fighting Bob" La Follette, of Wisconsin. As Governor of his State, La Follette pushed for regulation of railroads and the great corporations, which was more urgently needed than ever before.

By the time "Fighting Bob" took his seat in the United States Senate in 1907 the whole West—and many parts of the East as well—were again ready to take up arms. It was the period of the muckrake writer, exposing malpractices of business and politics alike. It was the period of the revolt of the small-business and professional man against his powerful competitors. Among the workers it was even more—it was a time for seriously considering the doctrines of a new collective social order.

PROGRESSIVES IN CONTROL IN MINNESOTA

The progressive era in Minnesota was marked by the liberal administrations of the popular Democrat, John A. Johnson, who was elected for three successive terms for Governor by the reform forces. If he had lived, Johnson would almost certainly have been the Democratic candidate for President in 1912, and most certainly would have been elected. He had the enthusiastic support of Grover Cleveland and other powerful political leaders.

He might have sat in the White House instead of Woodrow Wilson. It was the period of trust busting, and Minnesota sent many sons to Washington because they were anti-monopolists.

LINDBERGH—SYMBOL OF NEW REVOLT

Most prominent of these was the late Congressman, Charles A. Lindbergh, father of the colonel who was to be the first person to fly the Atlantic Ocean alone. A small-town lawyer, a Progressive Republican who believed passionately in the rights of the common man, a thoughtful student and searching critic of our economic system, an expert in the matters of currency and banking, a whole-hearted peace advocate when most of his fellow-Americans cried hysterically for war, Congressman Lindbergh became Minnesota's symbol of the new revolt.

Another Minnesotan who contributed the best years of his life to the progressive cause was Senator Moses Clapp, a keen lawyer, a liberal whom no party clique could dominate, and a friend of the masses. He was one of La Follette's admirers and close associates during the days when big business was a power which few public men could withstand. But Minnesota had faith in these men, because they carried forward the cause of the Progressives.

TRADE-UNIONS GROW POWERFUL—FARMERS BECOME AROUSED

At home the workers had rallied from the first great open-shop campaign and their trade-unions pushed the good work into many towns and cities in Minnesota. The railroad workers especially became strong. With their increased strength they also became progressive and forward-looking. The trade-unions possessed a militancy and social vision which made them a prominent force in the community.

Among the farmers, who had been so completely crushed by the defeat of the Populist uprising, the spirit of insurgency developed more slowly. Not until the cooperative movement had caught its second wind in the late nineties did the farmers become fully aroused. Then, in Minnesota, appeared certain signs that the farmer was once more preparing to go on the march against big business and its paid politicians.

MAGNUS JOHNSON, FARM LEADER

Several leaders were responsible for reawakening the tillers, and among them must first be mentioned Magnus Johnson, a dirt farmer who also in his youth was a city worker. He became interested in both worker and farmer movements, and later was to become one of the founders of the Farmer-Labor Party and recipient of the highest honors within the gift of the voters of Minnesota—a seat in the United States Senate.

Although Johnson saw clearly that it was necessary for the survival of farmers to elect honest progressives to office, he also realized that farmers could do much for themselves by cooperation. Accordingly he spent such time as he could spare from his own farm to organize cooperatives—creameries, elevators, telephone companies, insurance companies, and shipping associations. He and fellow farmers developed the first of hundreds of livestock-shipping associations in the Litchfield neighborhood in 1910.

LOFTUS MANAGES EXCHANGE

Important, also, as a progressive farm leader—although he was not a farmer himself but an independent businessman—was the late George S. Loftus, of St. Paul.

In Minnesota before the war there was just one farm organization which had influence.

This was the American Society of Equity, which preached cooperation for every phase of the farmer's life. Magnus Johnson was State president of this pioneer group. It organized in 1911 the now famous Equity Cooperative Exchange—the first grain-marketing cooperatives to appear in this country. Its offices were in Minneapolis; but not until the farmers hired George Loftus to manage the exchange did it develop into a formidable rival to the private grain concerns.

ATTEMPT TO DESTROY COOPERATIVES

The grain gamblers did everything possible to destroy the farmers' marketing organization. But due chiefly to the energy and intelligence of George Loftus and faithful farmers like Magnus Johnson, A. F. Teigen, Anthony C. Welch, Bert Cole, John Bosch, Sr., Mike Foley, Nels Peterson, Ole Dale, F. O. Pierce, and others, the Equity Cooperative Exchange lived and grew until it was getting 20 percent and more of the Twin City grain business.

Chief among Loftus' assistants were James Manahan and Benjamin Drake, liberal lawyers, and M. W. Thatcher, auditor. The exchange stood as a bulwark for the entire cooperative movement which was developing so rapidly in Minnesota and the other States of the Northwest.

TO THE POLITICAL FIELD

It was in these organizations that the farmers rallied for a new try at political and economic emancipation. The workers' movement, while developing independently, retained its traditional friendship for the farmers. At the same time the independent small-business and professional people—in whose name the progressives spoke—also felt tied to the great producing groups, in their fight against a common enemy. About it all there was an air of crusade. Men and women acted in the name of a cause which was very real to them.

It is also significant to note that in the election of 1912 more than 25 percent of the people of Minnesota voted against both the two conservative parties and for protest candidates in the campaign for Governor. In that year the Bull Moose Progressives, led by ambition and selfishness, proved abortive and futile. The voters had steadily become more independent of the two parties during the period of the insurgency, and now 1 voter in 4 refused to tag along with either of the two major camps. The time for independent action was near.

THE NONPARTISAN LEAGUE—HASTENS FARMER-LABOR DEVELOPMENT

Two events at this time hastened the development of the progressive movement in Minnesota which was to find its fruition in the Farmer-Labor Party.

The first of these events was the sudden, almost miraculous rise of the farmers' Nonpartisan League in the neighboring State of North Dakota during 1915 and 1916. The other was the overwhelming blight of everything progressive and decent in the war hysteria which culminated in our being dragged into the European battlefields in April 1917. These two events, plus the insurgent spirit of the masses, produced the Farmer-Labor Party.

In North Dakota the wheat farmer had been suffering from a combination of low, uncertain prices in a speculators' market, high-debt charges, and adverse weather. By 1915 the grain farmers of the Northwest were generally in desperate straits. Added to his production and marketing problems was the oppression of a railroad-dominated political tyranny practiced by the two old parties. Although the North Dakota farmers had voted overwhelmingly for State-owned elevators and other measures designed to protect him in a gamblers' and lenders' world, the State had ignored their mandate.

Equity societies and their cooperatives were a strong influence in North Dakota, and the campaign for State elevators came to a head at a meeting of the State equity farmers in February 1915. The legislators were told that the elevators must be built, and in reply these gentlemen told the farmers to "go home and slop your hogs!"

FARMERS FURIOUS AT TREATMENT

The farmers were, of course, furious. They were more than ready to listen to a young man who drove into their barnyards with a plan for a political league of the farmers and for the farmers. The man was Arthur C. Townley, a native Minnesotan who had been ruined as a farmer. Shortly the Non-Partisan League had thousands of members. In 1916 it swept the elections in North Dakota, electing a dirt farmer as Governor, LYNN J. FRAZIER. Active in the league with Townley was the present Congressman, WILLIAM F. LEMKE.

In the summer of 1916, league organizers began to sign up Minnesota farmers, who saw in the new plan a means of salvation. The league national office was established in St. Paul the next year, 1917, and the Minnesota farmers looked forward to a similar victory in 1918.

Official league data reveal that league membership in Minnesota in June 1917 was only 10,133, while that of North Dakota was 43,184. This figure, of course, does not show the actual league influence in Minnesota. For every farmer, there were 10 ardent sympathizers who were prevented by extreme poverty or by fear from joining the league.

By June of 1918, however, the Minnesota league had at least 42,000 members. It is safe to say that these thousands were the most active, courageous, and influential farmers in the State.

ORGANIZATION AND PROGRAM

The first State committee of the league was headed by resident farmers appointed by President Townley and included Herman F. Sprung, David Paquin, and L. E. Samuelson. George W. Griffith, of North Dakota, was named the first State manager. He served the league in this capacity for several years. As the league swung into full activity the cooperators and farmers of the equity group—including Magnus Johnson, James Manahan, Ferdinand Teigen, and others—joined in the efforts to make the farmers' movement a success.

The league plan for Minnesota was slightly different than that for the other States, and included demands for State-owned packing plants, elevators, and flour mills; State rural credits, a tonnage tax on iron ore, and State-owned pulp-paper mills. This program remained much the same during the life of the league in Minnesota.

THE FIRST WORLD WAR

Of the other event of this period, the World War, little can be said that is not familiar to everyone who lived through those days of dreadful hysteria. How the European war began in 1914 as a clash of economic rivalries, how the tension was so keyed that when two rivals decided to fight, all the empires had to fight in order to preserve their fields of exploitation, and how slowly and surely the United States was drawn into that camp which carried on the most cunning war propaganda. These are now matters of recorded history.

MINNESOTA LIBERALS FOR PEACE

In Minnesota, the peace sentiment was so intense that the war howlers soon singled out the State as being one of these distinctly favorable to Germany. The more accurate fact is that Minnesota early made its stand for peace and neutrality. The people of that State adhered to the Lindbergh-Lundeen policy, America first—absolute neutrality.

The Minnesota peace and neutrality societies had many thousands of members, and there were other groups almost as influential. The trade-unions and other liberal groups with whom they were closely allied demanded—through their press, their official spokesmen, by means of rank and file declarations—that America keep free of the quarrels and boundary disputes of Europe and the Old World.

The Non Partisan League farmers felt the same way. They knew that they had nothing to gain from this country becoming involved in war. Peace sentiment ran strong in Minnesota, both in the cities and in the country districts.

STAND AGAINST WAR HYSTERIA

But the war spirit was fanned to a fever pitch throughout the Nation, and many liberals, swept off their feet, deserted to the warmongers.

In the Nation's Capital in Congress, "Fighting Bob" La Follette, our beloved George Norris, Lane of Oregon, Gronna of North Dakota, Vardaman, and Stone in the United States Senate and 50 Members of the House of Representatives, including Lindbergh, Clapp, and Lundeen of Minnesota, stood out against the rising tide of madness—these few and the great, voiceless mass of the people.

WARMONGERING STATE ADMINISTRATION

In Minnesota the first to take up the cry for war was the shameful Republican State administration. War was hardly a fact for America in April 1917 when this administration was able to wring from the legislature a grant of powers exceeding even those given the President.

The notorious Commission of Public Safety was organized. Its objective was declared to be coordination of war activities in Minnesota.

But what was obvious to everyone was this: The commission was much more interested in smashing the militant farmers' movement, the trade-unions, and the peace and neutrality advocates than in any other purpose. Union men were forbidden even to wear their union buttons. Farmers were refused protection against mobsters at their rallies. Those who denounced the war for what it was—a war to rescue American dollars in Europe—were stoned and beaten, tarred, and shot at.

OUTRAGES ENCOURAGED

The houses of liberal leaders who had opposed the war were painted yellow and even riddled with bullets. The labor mayor of Minneapolis was threatened with impeachment. Speakers of the league were stoned and abused. Any progressive who raised his voice for a decent cause—whether concerned with the war or not—was harassed, framed, even jailed.

Thus men like James Manahan and Charles A. Lindbergh emerged from the war years with broken health and haunted minds, results of their suffering at the hands of the so-called public safety commission. Any man, any group which denounced the money-mad war profiteers and their political parties met with immediate punishment—all in the name of patriotism. Public decency took a vacation.

The members of that infamous committee were: Charles H. March, C. W. Ames, John Lind, John F. McGee, and A. C. Weiss. But old honest John Lind found the committee so bad that he finally resigned in utter disgust.

PROGRESSIVES BROKEN BUT NOT CRUSHED

The war, like a great boulder, had broken the wave of the mild Progressive era. Beneath this foaming wave there now was seen a determined flood of militancy. The forces of finance capital expected by the war to destroy the people's movement.

The people, on the other hand, saw a chance to strike back with the same weapon. It was they whose hands produced the weapons of this war and they determined to make their power felt.

What was going on in Minnesota between these two contenders repeated itself everywhere in America. The people were determined to come into their own, politically and economically.

STAGE SET FOR FARMER-LABOR PARTY

The crushing reign of war hysteria and conservatism formed the immediate background for the birth of the Farmer-Labor Party.

The farmers, the workers, the peace and neutrality advocates, the progressives had no place to go. Their training through the years of the Progressive period had been to act independently, speaking generally, as voters. They were tied to no political party. With the approach of the elections of 1918 it was clear that Minnesota was ripe for a political revolution.

The tactics of the Non-Partisan League in other States had been to capture the primaries of the leading party and thus put their own candidates upon the ballot under the very noses of their opponents.

The primary of 1918 in Minnesota was preceded by a great State convention of League farmers, held in St. Paul, March 18 and 19. From the first the tie between farmer and worker was evident. James Clancy, president of the St. Paul American Federation of Labor, union's central body, was the featured speaker.

LINDBERGH HEADS STATE SLATE

The slate of candidates offered in the Republican primaries by the farmers was headed by Charles A. Lindbergh for Governor. The rest of the ticket, as agreed upon finally, was: R. E. Crane, a farmer, for Lieutenant Governor; Thomas V. Sullivan, a Progressive lawyer, for attorney general; S. O. Tjosvold, a farmer, for auditor; Albert H. Fasel, a Progressive, for State treasurer; Fred E. Tillquist, a railroad labor leader, for railroad and warehouse commissioner; and Herman Mueller, a Progressive, for supreme court clerk. Mueller was elected and served 4 years.

Lindbergh received 150,626 votes; his opponent, J. A. A. Burnquist, 199,325. Many reactionary Democrats threw their weight behind Burnquist in order to stop the farmers. But it can be seen that the league had become a power. At the time of the election, there were 42,000 Leaguers in the State. In the teeth of the war mania it had grown to 4 times its size of the year before. It further attracted many thousands to vote for its candidates.

LABOR BECOMES POLITICALLY ACTIVE

But with the defeat of Lindbergh and nearly the whole slate, what was to be done now? While the farmers debated their next move, labor took a very significant step forward. For the first time since the days of the Knights of Labor, organized labor deliberately stepped upon the political stage.

Labor had watched the farmers organize with great interest. It was well known that the farmers' administration in North Dakota had shown its true people's character by passing every law that labor requested, putting that State far ahead of the others in the matter of pro-labor legislation. Organized labor was stronger in Minnesota than it had ever been before.

LABOR STRENGTH AT PEAK

Not including the unions represented in the mining, lake shipping, and timber cutting industries, the workers had at this time 497 unions located in 52 towns and cities of the State. In the American Federation of Labor and the railroad brotherhoods alone there were 52,000 workers. With the militant and the unorganized workers who were union-minded, this was a formidable force to throw into the political scales. But it must be granted that the terrible campaign of the reactionaries had cowed and silenced many of the workers.

At the 1918 convention of the American Federation of Labor Minnesota unions, two progressive labor figures crystallized the workers' political sentiments into a plan which would put the unions directly behind their own candidates. It was a startling departure from the traditional nonpartisan attitude of this important labor group.

These two men were William Mahoney and Charles Isaacson, both of the St. Paul Printing Pressmen's Union. They asked for an all-labor conference to put candidates in the field for State office. The suggestion was enthusiastically received by a majority of the delegates, and on August 25 of that year (1918) President Ed G. Hall and Secretary George W. Lawson, of the State federation of labor, convened the parley. Ninety local unions sent delegates.

WORKER AND FARMER COMMITTEES MEET

A committee of seven labor men was named to meet with a like committee of the Farmers' League to select candidates for the November elections. On this labor committee were: William Mahoney, chairman; J. A. Watkins, Fred Kreuger, J. J. Robbers, J. L. Tinkham, Clark Greenless, and Henry Gassing, representing all parts of the State. Some of these men were important officers of the State federation of labor.

Out of their committee conferences grew the endorsement by labor of three men for State office: The late David H. Evans, of Tracy, for Governor; Tom Davis, of Minneapolis, for attorney general; and the late Fred E. Tillquist, of St. Paul, for railroad and warehouse commissioner. Dave Evans was a hardware merchant and had been a liberal Democrat. Davis was a veteran labor lawyer. Tillquist was a prominent railroad labor official, a member of the Locomotive Firemen and Enginemen Brotherhood.

The farmers' committee which helped work out this slate, included: Magnus Johnson, Anthony C. Welch, Karl Knutson, O. O. Teuve, R. E. Crane, and Arne Grundysen. Although the farmers at first favored Johnson for Governor, they willingly accepted Evans as a good choice also.

PROFESSIONAL GROUPS BACK MOVE

There was a third group behind the efforts of the farmers and workers to form their own independent ticket in 1918—professional men. These men had been active in the campaigns of the progressives of the preceding years, and in the main had been opposed to the World War and had been marked for punishment by the Minnesota public safety mobs because of it. These liberals were not organized except in such groups as the Saturday Lunch Club, of Minneapolis—a forum where just such ideas as independent policies had long been centers of discussion.

A committee of the professional men approached the farmers and workers with an urgent plea for a new party which would represent peace, progress, and security. This group, because of its long training in politics under George Loftus and the other progressive Republicans, was of real use to the people's representatives, most of whom were untrained in the tactics of electioneering. These men were the most prominent of the professionals: Attorneys Fred A. Pike, Vince A. Day, Roy C. Smelker, Thomas L. Fraser, S. A. Stockwell, Julius J. Reiter, then mayor of Rochester; Drs. William E. Leonard and Henrik Shipstead; and others such as Carl Lewis, Benjamin Drake, Prof. William A. Schaper, and George Siegel.

FARMER AND LABOR TICKET FORMED

The decision was that there should be an independent ticket in the final elections of 1918. What to call the new ticket? The candidates had to run under some name. The progressives' candidates led by Lindbergh in the spring had commonly been called the farmer and labor or simply the farmer-labor candidates. There was the name for the independent ticket. And so, at a final meeting of the conferees at the old Merchant Hotel in St. Paul, it was decided to run Evans, Davis, and Tillquist under the Farmer-Labor banner.

Of course, it was not the intention of everyone to form a permanent new party—not then. Many of the farmers were not convinced that a new party would win their demands for them quicker than their nonpartisan political tactics hitherto pursued. The labor officials were somewhat bound to the old nonpartisan principles of "elect your friends, defeat your enemies." The professional men, however, saw clearly that a return to the old parties would be an admission of defeat. And there also were many in both the farmer and the worker camps who had faith in a new party.

SENTIMENT ON PERMANENT PARTY DIVIDED

A victory in the 1918 fall campaign would unquestionably have settled the matter in favor of those who wanted a new political party. But the Farmer-Labor candidates were not victorious. Evans polled about 112,000 votes—Lindbergh had received 150,000—in the primaries. It looked as though many people were in favor of progressives in office but could not shake themselves free of their old party ties to help them.

But it was realized that the campaign had not been a test of third-party sentiment among the voters, since it was fought in the face of fresh waves of terrorism on the part of the State administration. The Republican machine, enhanced by the powers given it at the outbreak of the war, held the State in the grip of a tyrant, refusing or permitting any opposition at will. The league had scheduled 250 meetings to discuss election problems but was forced by hoodlums and other lawless forces at the beck and call of the notorious Public Safety Commission and its governor, J. A. A. Burnquist, to cancel nearly a third of them. It was not safe in those days to engage in politics on a people's ticket. Imaginary flu epidemics were used to cancel the meetings of Congressman ERNEST LUNDEEN in both Dawson and Madison, Minn. This occurred under the direction of Theodore Christianson, the State administrator, and his political associates.

RISE OF INSURGENCY—BIRTH OF THE FARMER-LABOR PARTY

Nevertheless, it was in this fall campaign that the Minnesota Farmer-Labor Party was born, 20 years after the People's Party had met the forces of entrenched wealth head-on and had been smashed; out of repressions of the war years; from the desires of the common people for peace, neutrality, and progress, economic and political freedom. The name "Farmer-Labor," which was placed on the ballot in that election was destined to appear on the ballots of every Minnesota election thereafter. It meant that a new party had arisen on the political horizon of America to bring hope in the hearts of the oppressed and the underprivileged as well as all who believe in social and economic justice.

The end of the war found the people all over the world arising in revolt against former masters.

In the United States the tide of insurgent feeling ran high. In many States and cities labor followed the lead which Minnesota workers had provided. Farmer-labor and labor parties sprung up in many places.

The farmers' Non-Partisan League continued to grow, reaching out into new States until from Texas to Washington the sound of the organizer's model T could be heard along the country roads. Minnesota's league added more members and proved it could grow.

But the reactionaries did not sit unhappily by and do nothing. Now that labor was no longer needed to help steer the war machine, the national administration turned upon it savagely. Liberal and radical organizations were made to feel the sting of the Federal Government's wrath. Various departments of that administration once thought as liberal became the open aids of financial forces in order to crush the advancing people's movement.

REACTIONARIES MAKE NEW DRIVE—LABOR REPLIES TO ENEMIES

Organized labor had demonstrated what it could do in the political field in Minnesota, and now hastened to consolidate its gains. At the State Federation of Labor convention of 1919 a permanent organization through which the labor unions would express themselves politically was ratified. This was called the Working People's Non-Partisan Political League.

To this new organization could belong not only individuals but also entire unions and central bodies. It became the counterpart of the farmers' league. The two worked side by side. The Labor League's first executive board included William Mahoney, chairman; Thomas Van Lear, secretary; and C. Z. Nelson; Louis Frank; J. A. Watkins; A. E. Smith; and E. G. Whitney. All of them were from the Twin Cities.

During 1919 and the early part of 1920 the two leagues worked unceasingly to perfect their organizations and prepare the farmers and toilers for the contest of 1920.

The approach of this campaign found the progressives still of divided mind concerning a farmer-labor party. Some—such as Henry G. Teigan and William Mahoney—desired to see the two leagues merge into a strong, democratic, mass party. Townley and several of the Non-Partisan League leaders opposed this and urged, instead, that the farmers and workers remain nonpartisan so that they could exercise "a balance of power" between the two conservative parties.

THE 1920 ELECTION—AGAIN TRY TO CAPTURE G. O. P.

Thus it was that the leading candidates in 1920 did not file as Farmer-Labor. Instead they tried again to capture the Republican primary, and again without success. The fear of the candidates was that they could not draw supporters away from the Republican Party, and the election laws of the time prevented voters from crossing party lines to select whom they pleased. At the same time the Farmer-Labor Party was kept on the ballot by the filing of a number of candidates under that banner.

The leading candidates in 1920 were HENRIK SHIPSTEAD for Governor, George Mallon for Lieutenant Governor, and Thomas V. Sullivan for Attorney General. SHIPSTEAD, who later was to become United States Senator, was a professional man and a former progressive Republican candidate for Congress in 1918 in the Seventh District. He had served one term in the Minnesota Legislature during the war in 1917.

Mallon, who was politically active among the progressives, was a veteran of the World War; had received the Congressional Medal of Honor, and was the only Minnesotan on General Pershing's list of One Hundred Heroes of the World War. Sullivan, an ardent liberal and excellent platform man, was a popular St. Paul attorney, a law partner of James Manahan.

SHIPSTEAD came within a mere handful of votes of capturing the Republican nomination.

Filing on the Farmer-Labor ticket and unopposed in the primaries were Cyrus King for Governor, Lily Anderson for secretary of state, John P. Wagner for treasurer, and Emil C. MacKenzie for railroad and warehouse commissioner.

FARMER-LABOR PARTY KEPT ALIVE

After the primaries King withdrew in behalf of SHIPSTEAD, who, with Mallon and Sullivan, then filed by petition for the same offices they sought in the Republican primary, but this time as independents with Farmer-Labor endorsement.

These rather clumsy arrangements were the best that could be done while the Progressives were still undecided whether or not to keep the Farmer-Labor Party alive. The votes for regular Farmer-Labor candidates who made no campaign whatever ran close to 200,000 and convinced many that the new party was here to stay.

The final elections also revealed greatly increased strength. SHIPSTEAD received 281,000 votes to his Republican-machine opponent's 415,000. But the Shipstead vote was more than twice Evans' vote of 2 years before. As the Working People's League secretary, Van Lear, declared:

> The opposition claim we lost. I disagree with them because we did not have anything to lose. The fact is we made substantial gains.

SAVE THE STATE FROM SOCIALISM

The false slogan of the Republicans in the 1920 campaign was "Save the State from socialism." This slogan was supposed to be potent because of the current "red" scares being conducted all over America in order to discredit the labor and progressive movements. In Minnesota the Sound Government Association was formed, and through this fake outfit the big open-shop industrialists and the bankers poured hundreds of thousands of dollars in order to defeat the Farmer-Labor forces. The State was plastered with huge billboards screaming confusing and misleading slogans. An expensive publication called Minnesota Issues covered the State like a blanket of snow in a desperate attempt to smear the popular candidates.

It was in the face of this that the Progressives made their astonishing gains in voter strength.

WALL STREET ORDERS DEFLATION

Between the campaigns of 1920 and 1922 the farmers' depression set in—and it has lasted to this very day. Those who labored on the land from sunrise until sunset were the first to be ground down by the heartless deflation ordered by our captains of industry. The farmer was crushed under a heavy debt load incurred during a period of inflation—a debt load which is impossible for him to pay off even during periods of relative normalcy.

Suddenly there was an organized contraction of bank credits, prices began to tumble, the great war boom collapsed. This situation helped the Progressives. It gave the people one more great incentive to fight.

MOVE FOR INDEPENDENT POLITICAL ACTION

Also between the campaigns of 1920 and 1922 the Farmers Non-Partisan League underwent important changes. Its founder, Townley, stepped out. Thus was removed one of the most influential opponents of independent political action of farmers and workers. The way rapidly cleared to get behind the Farmer-Labor Party and make it the winner.

From the first, the workers and farmers displaced the Democratic Party as the leading opposition. Now the farm depression, the continued attacks upon workers' wages, and the general distrust in which the people held the corrupt Republican Party gave the new party reasons to think in terms of victory.

FILE COMPLETE SLATE OF CANDIDATES

The liberals filed a complete slate of candidates in the 1922 election under its own banner. It was the final warning that the Farmer-Labor people were in the field to stay, and to be reckoned with. United States Senator Frank B. Kellogg was up for reelection, and against him the Farmer-Labor Party pitted HENRIK SHIPSTEAD. For Governor that colorful farmer, Magnus Johnson, was selected. Other candidates were: Arthur A. Siegler for Lieutenant Governor; Susie W. Stageberg for secretary of state; Elizabeth Deming for auditor; Frank H. Keyes for treasurer; Roy C. Smelker for attorney general; W. W. Royster for railroad and warehouse commissioner; and Howard Van Lear for supreme court clerk. In addition, several congressional candidates had filed in the State's 10 districts with party endorsement.

The Farmer-Labor Party in that campaign advocated work relief for the unemployed; an increased iron-ore tonnage tax; a State-owned and operated cement plant; and increased capacity for the State flour mill which had been in operation for a year. This mill is now in danger of being dismantled under the present Republican regime. Opposition to the use of the injunction in labor disputes and to a State constabulary were other demands made by the Farmer-Labor Party. It is interesting to note that much of this program has subsequently been enacted into law.

LEAGUES WORK AS PERFECT TEAM

In this crucial campaign of 1922 the two leagues worked harder and more harmoniously than ever before. Their members sensed that victory was at hand and they set forth every ounce of effort and energy they possessed. The railroad brotherhoods continued their splendid support, sending into the State several fine speakers, and providing to a generous degree that rarest of all commodities of progressive politics—hard cash! "Fighting Bob" La Follette aided the campaigners with several speeches before tremendous crowds in the Twin Cities and several southern cities.

When election day arrived it was apparent that Dr. SHIPSTEAD had defeated Frank B. Kellogg for United States Senator, while Magnus Johnson's exciting campaign made it appear that he, too, would win. Final results showed that SHIPSTEAD had become America's first Farmer-Labor Senator, by 80,000 plurality. Johnson came within 15,000 votes of becoming Governor. In addition, Farmer-Labor Knud Wefald and O. J. Kvale went to Congress.

TRULY, THE FARMER-LABOR PARTY HAD ARRIVED

Nor was this all. The election struggles had resulted in victories in many legislative districts. In 1920, for example, the Farmer-Labor Party could claim successes in 46 districts. It must be remembered that the Minnesota Legislature is elected on a non-partisan basis. In 1922 the influence in the legislature of Farmer-Labor people increased even more.

MAGNUS JOHNSON GOES TO SENATE

A surprise victory was still in store for the new party. A few months after the elections, word came that Minnesota's elder Republican statesman, Senator Knute Nelson, had died. It was announced that a special election would be held to fill out the nearly 2 years' balance of his term.

The Farmer-Labor people had found Magnus Johnson an excellent campaigner and he proved to be the favored candidate in the Farmer-Labor primary held in June 1923. His opponent was the same machine Republican who had squeezed past him to win the governorship only a few months before. But this time the farmers and workers were ready for him. They knew their strength and they knew that the people were behind their program.

Magnus ran on the slogan, "Is a farmer good enough for the United States Senate?"

His Republican rivals foolishly countered this with "Send Magnus back to the pasture." It proved to be as foolish as it sounded. It was resented by the city workers as well as the farmers. The campaign was short and sweet. When it was over, Magnus had won by almost 100,000 votes.

Minnesota thus sent a second Farmer-Labor man to the United States Senate. The Republican wailing wall was now well established.

It was in a spirit of triumph and confidence that the toilers looked toward 1924. Meanwhile the agitation had gone on for clarification of the status of the Farmers' League, the Labor League, and the Farmer-Labor Party itself. A series of conferences were held throughout the winter and spring of 1923–24 looking toward the formation of a new organization which would combine the two leagues and carry on the activities of the Farmer-Labor Party between elections. Many new adherents came when Robert M. La Follette, Sr., in 1923 answered that he was through with the old parties and would enter a new alinement with the forces of progress Nation-wide.

ENTER FARMER-LABOR CLUBS

In many parts of the State—especially in the Twin Cities and the Brainerd area—there had developed a new type of political organization. It was called the Farmer-Labor Club. Unlike the clubs familiar to eastern city politics, the members of these groups paid regular dues, carried on their own educational campaigns for progressive principles, and in the case of the Sixth Congressional District even maintained their own newspaper, the Farmer-Labor Record.

The club rooted the new Farmer-Labor Party in the localities as even the leagues could not do. It was smaller than the leagues' units, and hence more mobile and more sensitive to local needs. To some of the Progressives it appeared to be the answer to the problem of how best to conduct the work of education, organization, and political effort.

LEAGUES MERGE INTO FEDERATION

In March of 1924 the two leagues met in Minneapolis at the same time and in nearby halls. There were 150 farmer delegates from 42 counties. On the labor side were representatives of no less than 100,000 workers from every section of the State. These people had already founded their own daily newspaper, of which they were very proud, the Minnesota Daily Star.

There remained a strong sentiment among the league farmers to keep intact their old organization, which, however, was suffering depletion in the ranks. But a majority of the farmers preferred entering the proposed Farmer-Labor Federation. When word came that the workers' convention had dissolved their league in favor of the new federation, the farmers began to debate. It was an exciting moment in Farmer-Labor history.

POLITICAL HISTORY MADE

Delegate Carl R. Carlgren, who had been on the labor committee visiting the farmers' convention, returned to the workers' hall finally with word of the results. As the Farmer-Labor Advocate reported it—

> For a moment there was a pause and silence. Then a great shout went up; delegates sprang to their feet; some climbed on chairs and tables; hats were thrown in the air; and labor men began to shout, "Hurrah for the farmers!"
> Scores of men grasped the hands of delegates to whom they had never spoken before and congratulated them. All were eager to learn whether the leaguers were coming over. Yes; they were coming. Soon they began to appear by dozens, by half dozens, by scores; and as they shouldered their way to their seats, the Federationists arose shouting their welcome, extending their hands and vacating seats for the farmers' comfort, while the hubbub was punctuated every few minutes by fresh outbursts as new groups appeared at the crowded doorways and sought their places in the council chamber with the workers. * * *

FARMER-LABOR FEDERATION BORN

Thus was born the Farmer-Labor Federation. Its first officers were William Mahoney, chairman, representing labor; Ralph Harmon, secretary, representing the farmers. The first executive board included the following district representatives: First, J. C. Placek and Walter J. Kennedy; second, John J. Johnson and W. C. Sprague; third, Fred E. Osborne and A. C. Welch; fourth, Frank Fisher and Frank Starkey; fifth, Robley D. Cramer and J. O. Johnson; sixth, A. H. Hendrickson and P. W. Anderson; seventh, Harold Baker and Hemming Nelson; eighth, George H. Webster and H. W. Dart; ninth, Louis Enstrom and J. C. Pratt; tenth, C. R. Hedlund and Gus Lundberg. Joseph Baldus later replaced Mr. Welch. This central body of authority was composed entirely of dirt farmers, workers who had left lathes or scaffolds to attend the convention, and progressive business and professional men.

CONVENTION ADOPTS PROGRAM; A FREE PRIMARY WITHOUT ENDORSEMENTS

The day following these stirring events there was a mass convention of Farmer-Labor adherents in St. Cloud to adopt a program and select candidates for the coming campaign. The program demanded start of the St. Lawrence Waterway, public ownership of all public utilities and natural resources, guaranty of labor's right to organize, adequate soldiers' bonus, cooperative banks, and the McNary-Haugen plan of aid to farmers. How much of this is now accepted law others may judge.

Because of the rapid change to the new basis of the Farmer-Labor Federation, and for the sake of preserving harmony, it was decided to make no endorsements for office but to allow the primary vote to decide the slate. Whether that choice was a wise one or whether injury was done to the party remains a question to this day. Some of the candidates turned their attacks away from the common enemy and directed their fire on their primary rivals. The future must determine that question.

A NEW LEADER EMERGES—FLOYD B. OLSON

However, from the tangle of primary candidates and the heated primary campaign, there did emerge a man not only eminently fitted to hold high public office but also with the necessary qualities to become the leader of this new party.

He was a talented young man, tall and graceful, with a winning smile and a persuasive voice; a man who did not hesitate to take his position on the side of the people, whose principles had been forged on the anvil of hard labor in the mine, railroad yard, and harvest field, and whose honesty and courage already had been amply demonstrated in public office.

This man was Floyd B. Olson, the son of Norwegian and Swedish immigrants. He was then county attorney of the State's largest county, Hennepin, and already was recognized as one of the foremost men holding office in Minnesota. As a prosecutor, he showed that he was primarily interested in the dispensation of elementary justice. He filed as candidate for Governor on the Farmer-Labor ticket and won the nomination in a spirited campaign.

Up for relection in 1924 was Senator Magnus Johnson. His progressive record in Washington seemed to assure him a return to office. The entire slate of candidates which emerged from the primary prepared for victory in the fall, despite the confusion and ill feeling which had been features of the elimination contests.

NATIONAL AND STATE CAMPAIGNS NOT COORDINATED

However, another element entered the situation. This was the candidacy on the national scene of the fighting Progressives, Senators LA FOLLETTE and WHEELER. To the detriment of all, the national campaign and the campaigns of the Farmer-Labor candidates did not mesh until very late in the year. Had there been a planned campaign of the National and State Progressives from the start, the ultimate results in all likelihood would have been different.

All the time the reactionaries continued their attacks upon the liberals. Workers and businessmen were threatened with dire consequences if they did not return Coolidge to the White House. Hard times, panic, riots, bread lines—these terrible things would be the result of taking LA FOLLETTE and WHEELER and the Farmer-Labor people seriously. A subtle change was coming over large sections of the American people by 1924; the people were being lulled to sleep by a false prosperity.

THE G. O. P. PROSPERITY CAMPAIGN

The Republican newspapers thoroughly dinned into the public ear that good times had arrived forever. They need do nothing but vote Republican to keep the beautiful picture of boundless prosperity hanging on the parlor wall.

Because the masses lacked a voice to match this blare of publicity, it was difficult to make it known that the farmers still had to labor from sunup to sundown merely to keep the sheriff from seizing their stock and tools; that in many industries wages were slowly declining while hours were going up; that machines were being introduced at a very rapid rate—machines which were throwing workingmen permanently out of their jobs; that women workers were still getting less for the same work that men did; that prosperity was an actuality mainly for those with sufficient funds to play the stock market or for those who could buy stocks and bonds of the wealthy monopolies.

FAKE CAMPAIGN SUCCEEDS

These were disagreeable facts; the fine picture of good times was easier to take. The militancy of the war years, the crusading spirit of the progressive era, were being sapped away.

Until the house of cards would fall the Progressives could do little but wait for the majority sentiment to return to their side. The 1924 election, which the farmers and workers were convinced they would win, ended in heartbreaking defeat.

True, the Farmer-Labor candidates ran ahead of the National Independent Progressive ticket. "Fighting Bob" lost Minnesota by 80,000. Olson lost the governorship by 40,000. Worst of all, Magnus Johnson was defeated for reelection, but only by 8,000 votes in a total vote which approached a million.

THE CREDIT SIDE OF THE LEDGER

On the credit side the western farmers returned Congressmen Wefald and Kvale to Washington, and a third Farmer-Laborite, William L. Carss, of Duluth, was also sent to Congress.

An outcome of the disastrous 1924 contest was a revamping of the Farmer-Labor Federation. New conferences initiated in 1925 by the present Farmer-Labor Congressman, RICHARD T. BUCKLER, resulted in the federation adopting a new constitution and a new name.

The constitution forbade membership to revolutionists. The new name was the Farmer-Labor Association. This is the organizational structure which has housed the Farmer-Labor Party to this day.

STRUCTURE OF FARMER-LABOR ASSOCIATION

A word about the association. It would be hard to find its counterpart in American political history. It is composed of hundreds of ward and township clubs, some of which have 400 and more active members. It also consists of trade unions, cooperatives, and farmers' economic organizations. Until recently it likewise included cultural and language societies and the units of unemployed organizations.

The members of the association pay dues and support a newspaper, the Minnesota Leader, probably the most influential weekly in the State. Their club meetings are enlivened by debates on the issues of the day and on party policy. Once a year, conventions are held at which officers are chosen. In addition, there is a central committee of 18 chosen by members themselves at district conventions.

CONVENTIONS—MEETINGS OF RANK AND FILE

The 1926 and 1928 conventions of the association were actually then meetings of the delegate representatives of the party rank and file. At these conventions full slates of candidates were endorsed for the primaries.

In 1926 this slate was Magnus Johnson, a farmer, for Governor; Emil Holmes, a professional man, for Lieutenant Governor; Charles Olson, a Progressive, for secretary of state; S. O. Tjosvold, a farmer, for auditor; Thomas J. Meighen, a small-town banker, for treasurer; Frank E. McAllister, a lawyer, for attorney general; Thomas Vollom, a farmer, for railroad and warehouse commissioner; and Mrs. Minnie Cederholm, a rural housewife, for supreme court clerk.

JOHNSON LEADS HIS TICKET

Johnson received the best support in the finals, winning 266,000 votes to his Republican opponent's 395,000. Reelected were Congressmen Carss and Kvale, but Congressman Wefald was nosed out by a few votes. The program remained much the same as that of 1924.

The situation in 1928 remained unchanged. The Republicans made much of the so-called golden prosperity with which they had blessed the country. Only the Progressives seemed able to discern that this good-time platform was like a rotten plank over a deep pit of collapse. The Republican candidate for President, Herbert Hoover, felt confident enough of the future to offer Americans two cars in every garage, a chicken in every pot—or was it two chickens? That giddy era of stock-market millionaires is largely forgotten now.

SHIPSTEAD REELECTED TO SENATE

Despite the din of self-praise in the Republican press, Minnesota's Farmer-Labor Senator, HENRIK SHIPSTEAD, was reelected by a smashing majority. The slate of 1928 was: ERNEST LUNDEEN, for Governor; Thomas J. Meighen, for Lieutenant Governor; Mrs. Susie W. Stageberg, for secretary of state; Peter J. Seberger, for treasurer; C. F. Gaarenstroom, for attorney general; and J. L. Peterson, for railroad and warehouse commission. Only Congressman Kvale, in the southwestern farm district, was returned to Congress with Senator SHIPSTEAD. LUNDEEN ran ahead of the State ticket to poll 227,000 votes against the Republican rival's 549,000.

HIGH SUMS FOR CAMPAIGN PURPOSES

These were the years of modest, poverty-stricken campaigns for the Farmer-Labor candidates. While the Republicans continued to collect huge sums for campaign purposes, and to have as well an obedient State machine, the progressives conducted their campaigns with the nickels and dimes of the working people. It is cause for high praise that the party held its ranks.

Throughout the 20's the Farmer-Labor Party was the chief opposition party in a Minnesota saddled with a do-nothing Republican Party. The Progressives' campaigns were primarily educational in order to acquaint the people with the facts. In these campaigns the program which the New Deal later promised won power and was firmly laid. Social security, work for the unemployed, labor protective legislation, debt relief and cost of production for the farmers, old-age pensions, Government power and transportation projects, tax adjustment—these attainments and objectives which are common coin today were long ago given full discussion in the clubs and circles of the Farmer-Labor Party of Minnesota.

The best traditions of the early grangers—the People's Party, the Progressives, the labor parties—the militants of the war years, were handed down without a break to the present day.

FARMER-LABOR PARTY ANSWERS UNIVERSAL DEMAND

Some of our national historians, born and bred in the East, have failed to discover in the Minnesota farmer-labor movement the wider lessons with which it is studded. To many of them it was, and still seems to be, a matter of local moment, a passing fancy of the American political scene.

Nothing could be further from the truth. What the Minnesota farmers and wage workers and independent business and professional groups desire, through independent political action, is exactly the same as these groups everywhere in America desire. The Farmer-Labor Party stands for more than local discontent. It voices the demands of these great groups of our citizens to keep America free and restore economic opportunity for all. This is a universal demand.

During the glittering years of the stock-market prosperity the Farmer-Labor Party remained the symbol of the largely unfulfilled needs of the common man for a better, fuller, freer life. We were determined that our party should live, because it had, and still has, a destiny to meet.

ORGANIZATIONS AND ORGANIZERS

And yet, while it is true that this conviction burned like a live coal, it must be recognized that by itself it would not have kept the party alive. What accomplished this during the period of so-called good times (which was really the hidden depression of the farmers) was the hard and unselfish work of a few men and women. Henry G. Teigan, for example, continued the work of publicizing the program and aims of the party through the columns of the Farmer-Labor Advocate and the Minnesota Union Advocate. The latter paper, under the able editorship of Bill Mahoney, became the leading organ of the movement.

Other editors also carried on the educational campaign which has made the Farmer-Labor Party so much more than a mere party. These included the labor editors, R. D. Cramer, of Minneapolis; the late William (Billy) McEwen, of Duluth; and Oscar Widstrand, of the Hibbing Independent; the rural editors, Fay Cravens, of Milaca; Edward Barsness, of Glenwood; Charles Coy, of Alexandria; Archie Whaley, of Moorhead; former Congressman Francis Shoemaker, then of Red Wing; certainly the veteran publisher of the Willmar Daily Tribune, Victor E. Lawson; and many others.

In addition were other leaders who had begun in the ranks, and whose strength remained there, such as Magnus Johnson, Knud Wefald, O. J. Kvale, Louis Enstrom, Mrs. Susie Stageberg, Mrs. K. K. Moore, Frank Starkey, Fred Tillquist, Lawrence Arland, Judge William A. Anderson, Otto Goetsch, and Tom Vollum. And there were dozens of others. These men and women should take pride that they steered the party through its times of trial.

G. O. P. FAKE PROSPERITY CRASHES

The Farmer-Labor Party, late in 1929, observed with the rest of the country the spectacular collapse by which prosperity's house of cards came down. The bottom fell out of the fake Republican prosperity. Republican rule was now exposed for what it was—government of special privilege, by special privilege, for special privilege. Progressives had often predicted just such a disastrous result for the people, of the frenzied finance of the Coolidge-Hoover period. But the majority of the Nation needed time to see that the end of an age had come. By election day, 1930, the people of Minnesota were already prepared to act.

FLOYD OLSON COMES TO THE FORE

There was one man in the State at that time about whom most people thought first in considering the best man for Governor. This was Floyd B. Olson. He had just concluded a hard-hitting campaign against the racketeer elements in Minneapolis, in his capacity as county attorney. He was hailed throughout the State for his courage and ability.

The party convention was held in March. The executive committee of the association at that time consisted of Frank Starkey, Carl R. Carlgren, Anthony C. Welch, Henry G. Teigan, S. A. Stockwell, and Thomas Meighen. It was apparent from the first that Olson could have either the nomination for Governor or United States Senator. He chose the Governorship, and the party gladly gave him its endorsement. On the ticket to make the campaign with him were Ernest Lundeen, for United States Senator; Henry Arens, for Lieutenant Governor; Judge J. B. Himsl, for attorney general; Anna O. Determan, for secretary of State; William Mahoney, for auditor; Thomas J. Jackson, for treasurer; and Elmer E. Johnson, and Carles E. Berquist, for railroad and warehouse commissioners.

ELECTED FIRST FARMER-LABOR GOVERNOR

Olson made a hard campaign, covering the State thoroughly before the election. He leveled a merciless barrage against what he called the corrupt Republican hierarchy. His Republican opponent had the use of an expensive sound truck and trailer equipped with loudspeakers, but Olson shunned fancy campaigning.

When he stepped upon a soap box or a wagon tail gate he needed no microphones. He pledged himself to the party program, which called for farm-mortgage relief, a State old-age pension system, chain-store taxation, and general tax relief by taxation in accordance with ability to pay, and many other progressive demands since enacted either by the State or by the Federal Government. In this contest the Olson brilliance as a speaker made itself manifest.

In the final elections Floyd Olson, champion of the underprivileged, defeated both his Republican and Democratic opponents by a plurality of nearly 200,000 votes. He became the first Farmer-Labor Governor in American history—marking the beginning of a new and bright era for the Farmer-Labor Party and a new hope for all who labor by brawn and brain. It was obvious to all that this great crusading movement had found its champion to proclaim its message throughout the length and breadth of the land. The Farmer-Labor Party had truly arrived to become an increasingly vital political force in this State and Nation.

ARENS ELECTED LIEUTENANT GOVERNOR

Elected with Olson was Henry Arens, Lieutenant Governor. Arens was a vice president of the State's largest cooperative, a dirt farmer, and a fighter for both farmer and progressive causes. Reelected also was Paul J. Kvale as party candidate for Congress from a western prairie district. The Democratic Party almost disappeared in Minnesota and there developed the rush of the liberals to the Farmer-Labor banner. The upsurge of Progressives was evident in congressional elections all over the country, which sent to Washington a Congress composed of many Democrats in opposition to Hoover's do-nothing policies.

The rest of the State offices were filled in 1930 by conservative Republicans. Likewise, the two houses of the legislature, while nonpartisan, were very conservative. Olson's fight was thus clearly outlined. His enemies surrounded him. While he would be made responsible for every act, he had little control over more than the affairs of the Governor's office itself. He knew, however, how to call public opinion to his aid and thus compel the reactionaries to support measures in the public interest to which they were opposed.

A SAGA OF PROGRESSIVE POLITICAL HISTORY

Floyd B. Olson was to be Minnesota's Governor for three consecutive terms. At no time during these three terms did he have the support of a legislature sympathetic to the program of the Farmer-Labor Party. And yet the achievements of his administration are one of the sagas of American progressive political history and offer us proof that the common people can ultimately achieve social and economic emancipation through a political party of their own over which they exercise control. The Farmer-Labor Party is a party of truly democratic rank and file control.

ACHIEVEMENTS OF THE OLSON ADMINISTRATION

A review of the achievements of the Olson administration, which cannot be undertaken in full here, shows not only inestimable benefits accruing to the people of his own State, but the blazing of new trails extending far beyond the State's borders. Minnesota's new deal clearly foreshadowed the New Deal of a later day. His administration, for example, undertook a public-works program to combat unemployment before the New Deal came into power. He recommended unemployment-insurance compensation to the State legislature before the national administration proposed this advanced measure. He undertook a youth program for Minnesota upon which the National Youth Administration was later modeled. He fought for the right of labor to organize and to bargain collectively, helping greatly to pave the way for passage by the Federal Government of the Wagner National Labor Relations Act and other social legislation.

He interceded with the national administration in behalf of the farmer and was largely responsible for the Federal Government's seed and feed loan policy and leniency in collection of farm debts. He obtained passage of the Mortgage Moratorium Act, the first act of its kind passed in the country, which saved thousands of city homes and farms from mortgage foreclosure, and which was followed by passage of similar legislation by other progressive States. This was one of the most significant progressive achievements of recent years, and introduced into our body of law an altogether new concept of property rights—namely, that the property rights of those who own their homes and their farms is even more sacred in times of economic crisis, over which the people have no control and for the making of which they are not responsible, than are the property rights of the mortgage holders.

SERVICE TO LABOR AND FARMER

It was no mere accident that the first time troops were called out in this country during a labor dispute to protect the civil rights of the strikers and the public, rather than to browbeat and shoot the workers down, occurred during the Farmer-Labor administration—the administration of Governor Olson. The Governor sought to preserve labor standards and, during the clamor for wage reductions, he insisted that the State set the example as a model employer by payment of living wages. He obtained passage of a law prohibiting issuance of injunctions in labor disputes.

Floyd Olson carried on the battle for the farmer, both within the State of Minnesota and in the Nation's Capital. He made great headway toward revision of the tax system in conformity with the Farmer-Labor principle of taxation and in accordance with ability to pay by obtaining passage of a graduated income-tax law; a homestead tax which granted preferential tax treatment to modest city homes and farms; a graduated chain-store tax which aided the small, independent merchant; increased taxes upon wealth. By vetoes he defeated the efforts of the reactionaries to impose a sales tax on the State.

MADE GREAT SOCIAL STRIDES

In all fields of social endeavor, the administration of Floyd Olson made great forward strides. Educational standards of the State were raised by State aid to school districts which were unable to levy sufficient tax money to support decent schools; by opposing, in the face of violent opposition, cuts in teachers' salaries; by strengthening laws relating to teachers' tenure; and by a vigorous fight for academic freedom in our schools and colleges. For the aged he obtained passage of the first State-wide old-age pension law.

By displaying great resourcefulness, he forced a reactionary legislature to pass adequate relief appropriations, threatening to declare martial law to feed the hungry if the legislators failed to heed the people's demands. He brought to an end a period of exploitation of the State's natural resources through creation of a unified Department of Conservation, and formulation of a long-time, forward-looking program of conservation to assure that the natural resources would be developed and utilized in the interest of all the people rather than for the few.

This was a common people's government at work. It was government which carried out the finest traditions of America—democracy at work.

1932 ELECTION EXTENDS FARMER-LABOR GAINS

The March 1932 convention of the Farmer-Labor Association met in an atmosphere of a tense national election which had repercussions in Minnesota. Olson was, of course, enthusiastically indorsed for reelection. The Farmer-Labor ticket included: K. K. Solberg for Lieutenant Governor; Harry H. Peterson for attorney general; John T. Lyons for secretary of state; A. H. Kleffman for treasurer; Knud Wefald for railroad and warehouse commissioner.

During the campaign there came to the aid of the Farmer-Labor ticket several out-of-State Progressives, including Senators NYE and FRAZIER, of North Dakota, and Senator LA FOLLETTE, of Wisconsin. As might be expected, Olson's campaign was a bold and relentless attack upon toryism and economic special privilege.

The returns in November revealed that a clear majority of the voters agreed with their Governor. His plurality was 188,000 in one of the most strenuous campaigns which the State had witnessed to that time.

OTHER VICTORIOUS FARMER-LABOR CANDIDATES

This time the party had greatly improved its position. Elected with Olson were K. K. Solberg, a farmer legislator, Lieutenant Governor; Harry H. Peterson, now a member of the State supreme court, attorney general; and Knud Wefald, an independent businessman, railroad and warehouse commissioner.

Because of a veto by Governor Olson of a vicious gerrymander bill in 1931, the congressional elections of 1932 were all at large. In this contest the rapidly increasing strength of the Farmer-Labor Party was seen. Of the 9 Congressmen elected, 5 were of the Farmer-Labor Party. These had won through a primary contest involving 35 candidates. The victors were Magnus Johnson, Ernest Lundeen, Henry Arens, Paul J. Kvale, and Francis Shoemaker. Johnson led the entire delegation, receiving the highest number of votes. It was the high-water mark for Farmer-Labor representation in Congress.

Nor does this tell the whole story of the 1932 victory. When the lower house of the State legislature came to vote for speaker, it was seen that the Farmer-Labor choice, Charles Munn, a farmer, was elected by a vote of 74 to 56. However, the senate seats had not been up for reelection, and thus the Olson administration was again faced with the same handful of die-hard Tories in the upper body, which attempted to stay the wheel of progress.

SEVERE DEPRESSION HITS FARMER—LIBERALS ORGANIZE LOWER HOUSE

It was a time of severe depression on the farm. Rural newspapers carried page after page of mortgage-foreclosure notices. The average farm debt was $4,800. The average annual interest payment was $260. Worst of all, it now required 740 bushels of wheat to pay this interest charge if the farm was not to be wrested away from the farmer. In 1919 the same interest charge had been met with only 116 bushels. In 1925 it would have required ten 250-pound hogs to pay such interest, but in 1933—with hogs at 3 cents a pound—it required 33 hogs to do the same.

In Minnesota 60 percent of the farms were mortgaged. Farmers were losing them as fast as the insurance companies and other mortgage holders foreclosed, in brutal efforts to get their money back. City people also were losing their homes with the same rapidity.

Into this situation Olson boldly thrust his famous proclamation declaring a moratorium on foreclosures. A legislative act was then in preparation by Attorney General Peterson. It was enacted into law. The tone of the Olson administrations was always one of progress through legislation. The fact that liberals never controlled both houses of the legislature prevented the passage of most liberal demands.

REACTIONARY ASSAULT BEATEN OFF—MORTGAGE MORATORIUM LAW PASSED

As the 1934 election approached, the conservatives laid careful plans to wipe out Olson and all he and the Farmer-Labor Party stood for. This time the Farmer-Labor convention brought forward a program pointing to the cooperative movement as a superior form of economic structure. Olson praised it as offering a constitutional means to win human equality and security.

The candidates on the State ticket at this time included: Henrik Shipstead for United States Senator; Hjalmar Petersen for Lieutenant Governor; John T. Lyons for auditor; Harry H. Peterson for attorney general; A. H. Kleffman, treasurer; K. K. Solberg, secretary of state; Laura Naplin, supreme court clerk; and Charles Munn for railroad and warehouse commissioner.

The Republican dailies in the State, conducted a post-card poll which, strangely enough, revealed that the Republican candidate would defeat Olson. Olson later proved it to be the laughing stock of the election. The conservative Democrats also were determined to defeat the liberals. The closing days of the campaign found Emil Hurja, an employee of the Democratic national chairman, denouncing Olson over a Minnesota radio network.

Word soon came that the President had called this gentleman upon the carpet for a severe dressing down because of the attempt to make it appear that the national administration desired the defeat of Olson.

These were merely examples of the savage campaign conducted. Every conceivable form of hysterical propaganda, every slander and scheme to frighten the voters, had been tried.

FARMER-LABOR VICTORY IN 1934 CAMPAIGN

But when it came the voters' turn to speak, the Farmer-Labor Party triumphed again. Every candidate on the ticket was elected or made a strong showing. The party had been unified as never before by the attacks upon it and it had grown wonderfully in strength and force. People thought more seriously than ever about the complex problems of government and of economic security.

Elected with Governor Olson, were Hjalmar Petersen, Lieutenant Governor, who, as chairman of the house tax committee, had steered the graduated income tax through the State legislature; Harry H. Peterson, attorney general; Charles Munn, railroad and warehouse commissioner. Munn joined Wefald on the commission to win control of it for the Farmer-Labor Party.

It is hard to understand how, with this victory, the legislature could be conservative in composition. Yet this is what occurred. Perhaps the reason can be found in the nonpartisan character of the legislature, enabling conservatives to seek office as liberals.

Despite the fact that the depression had deepened, the conservative legislators decided that their chief work would be an investigation of all Farmer-Labor departments. The relief situation had become so acute that Federal funds to the State had to be suspended. In order to support the Governor's demands for sufficient relief appropriations a mass meeting of farmers was held at the capital. It demanded legislation that would meet the needs of the common people. At this mass meeting a leading figure in the militant Farmers Union declared that Floyd Olson would be the next President of the United States. With a great shout, the crowd showed its approval.

OLSON DEFEATS HIS OPPONENTS

The conservatives tried persistently to put over a sales tax. The Governor stood firm in his opposition to it. "I will not approve a tax upon poverty—upon bread and shoes," he insisted. Despite the attitude of the legislature, much of the Governor's program was forced through.

The struggle between the Governor and his opponents was far from ended, however. By winter, matters had become so acute that Olson called a special session. He asked for passage of a better old-age pension bill based upon payments regulated by need; increases in the income tax for more school aid; increases in the money and credits tax and upon wealth to pay the costs of social legislation; the unemployment compensation financed by employees. The conservatives granted only increased old-age pensions, blind pensions, and arranged to have delinquent taxes collected.

About this time it first became evident that all was not well with the Governor's health. On the last day of 1935 he underwent an operation to determine the cause of a gastric disorder he had been suffering. He never fully recovered his vigor.

BENSON APPOINTED UNITED STATES SENATOR

Also at this time the death of a United States Senator opened the way for Minnesota once more to claim two Farmer-Labor Senators simultaneously.

This had not happened since 1923–24. Senator Thomas D. Schall, Republican, struck down in a traffic accident, died in Washington. There was a forthcoming session of Congress, and Governor Olson announced he would appoint a successor, and in the fall make the race for Senate himself. Although he could have realized a life ambition to become Senator at that time, he said that he did not want to reach that office except by a vote of the people. Elmer A. Benson, State banking commissioner, was named by him as Senator to fill the vacancy caused by the death of Senator Schall.

OLSON SUPPORTS STRICT NEUTRALITY LEGISLATION DURING FOREIGN WARS

The summer found Olson somewhat recovered in health. His plans for the fall campaign were shaping up rapidly. The issue upon which he would make his fight, he said, was reform of the Supreme Court. That body had just invalidated the first A. A. A. and the N. R. A. Olson determined to seek a constitutional amendment to make appointments to the Supreme Court not for life but for a definite number of years.

He also demanded strict neutrality legislation during foreign wars and pledged a hard fight to that end.

FARMER-LABOR CONVENTION DEMONSTRATION FOR OLSON

The 1936 convention of the Farmer-Labor Association, held in St. Paul, was one of the most enthusiastic in the history of the party. Several thousand persons attended, and at the appearance of the beloved Governor staged a wild demonstration. The party had now been in a dominant position in State politics for 6 years and could point to a list of reforms which, though battered by the die-hard reactionaries, was notable even in an age of reform.

A GREAT LEADER PASSES

Following the convention, Olson was again taken very ill, and a second corrective operation was needed. This slowed his campaign. He left the hospital early in August, intending to rest a few weeks before beginning the fall drive. However, on the 16th he suffered a severe relapse and returned to the Mayo Clinic, from which he never left alive. He died August 22, 1936, thus bringing an abrupt end to a brilliant career which was about to place him in the United States Senate and held out for him the strong possibility of election as the first Farmer-Labor President of the United States.

HJALMAR PETERSEN BECOMES GOVERNOR

The Lieutenant Governor, Hjalmar Petersen, was sworn in as Governor and continued to serve in that capacity until the following January. Governor Petersen in his short term adhered to Farmer-Labor principles and a special session of the legislature called by him passed an unemployment insurance act. Minnesota workers were thus assured of the benefits of the National Unemployment Insurance Act the first day the law was put into operation.

OLSON SPIRIT STIMULATES CAMPAIGN

The election campaign from that point had a different aspect. The spirit of the lost leader was as great a factor to reckon with as his personality had been. The progressives deeply felt the need to keep faith with the man who had led them so well and with whom they had worked so long.

Chosen to take his place on the ticket by the unanimous action of the central committee was Congressman ERNEST LUNDEEN, of the Third Congressional District, then preparing for reelection to Congress. To LUNDEEN's place on the ticket for Congress went Henry G. Teigan.

LIBERALS UNITE FOR VICTORY

The campaign was again being conducted during a national election. This time the national administration threw its whole weight behind the Farmer-Labor Party. The leading candidates of the Democratic ticket withdrew and the fusion of the two parties on the Farmer-Labor ticket resulted in a smashing blow at the Republicans. Final result revealed that ERNEST LUNDEEN had won by a majority of 260,959 votes for the Senate and Elmer Benson by a majority of 248,502 for Governor.

A majority of the congressional delegation again became Farmer-Labor.

Elected were Richard T. Buckler, Henry G. Teigan, John T. Bernard, Dewey W. Johnson, and Paul J. Kvale. These men represented the entire farming districts of western Minnesota, the iron range country, and the city of Minneapolis.

LIMITATIONS OF STATE ADMINISTRATION

Let us consider for a moment the limitations of a State administration. Its operations in social and economic spheres have gradually been curtailed through the years, the result of the desire of big business to gather all control at a central point and then to take charge of that center. This has been going on in America since the days of Hamilton.

If the Farmer-Labor Party won partial control of Minnesota State government—and it did for 8 consecutive years—it found that all needed reforms, with the possible exception of one, generally had to run a gantlet of the courts clear to the highest bench in the land. There it was nip and tuck whether the reformers could save their legislation. The Tory traditions of the high courts are known to everyone.

THE FIGHT FOR JUST TAXATION

The one possible exception to this was taxation, where the State still retains some responsibility.

Tax relief is a crying need in Minnesota, where even the basic constitution names the railroads as specially privileged to escape all but a small share of their proper tax load. Tax relief is linked closely with the need of the farmer, the worker, and the independent businessman to win security.

In the case of the farmer especially, it was a fact that he paid twice as much taxes as any other group of citizens in relation to income.

The Farmer-Labor Party tried desperately to make a real accomplishment of tax relief in Minnesota. Governor Olson fought until he had wrung from an opposition legislature an income-tax law. But he did not ask for this law without at the same time demanding reductions in taxes on farm and city homes. Thus, it never was a mere matter of more taxes. It was a reasoned adjustment of the tax burden so that those with ability to pay were required to do so.

BENSON CONTINUES TAX FIGHT

This was the background of the fight carried on by Gov. Elmer A. Benson and the lower house in 1937 against a Tory senate. Olson had been able to take tax relief part way; Benson was determined to finish the job Olson started. His object was an entirely new tax structure which would relieve general property of its load. In the end he was forced to call a special session before he could force concessions from the conservatives.

It was a long, bitter struggle. The reactionaries, as had been their practice for years, sat doing nothing. Of course, Benson and the other progressives did not allow them to continue this attitude. The Governor was a man of determination. When he made pledges he intended to stick by them. He had been elected by a vote which was a mandate from the people to enact his reform program. Tax relief headed that program. Its other "must" features were: A State housing act; sufficient relief funds to cover all needs; full coverage for unemployment compensation; a fair trades and practices act in behalf of independent merchants; reduction of rural credits interest rates to farmers; and a State labor relations act based upon the Wagner Act.

UPPER HOUSE FIGHTS PROGRAM

It was clear through all that fight that the people were on the side of the liberals. But that made the result no more certain. The conservative State senate would have gone to its grave fighting rather than expose the wealthy and special interests groups to any reform. In the end, however, the general property tax was reduced substantially.

Taxes on Steel Trust, telephone and telegraph companies, express and freight lines, and on incomes and chain stores were increased.

While the objective of complete tax revision was not—could not—be achieved because of the senate, at least the main features were.

The Benson administration attempted to carry out the liberal traditions of the Farmer-Labor Party and to follow the examples set by the great Floyd B. Olson.

Whenever the administration interceded to bring about peace in labor disputes, the rights of the workers were never compromised, particularly the right of collective bargaining. The administration refused to renew the licenses of two national detective agencies to do business in Minnesota because of the antilabor activities of these agencies as revealed before the La Follette Senate Civil Liberties Committee. Academic freedom in our schools and colleges was stoutly defended and a dark blot upon the University of Minnesota's record, placed there by the discharge during the period of the first World War hysteria of the head of the department of political science, Dr. William Schaper, was removed.

In the face of strong opposition, the administration succeeded in maintaining decent relief standards.

The farmer-labor tax program, with the aid of a liberal lower house, was further advanced through passage of the homestead exemption act, increased taxes upon iron ore and upon wealth, and reduction in real-property taxes. A law was passed fixing a minimum royalty of 50 cents per ton on all iron ore removed from State-owned lands for all new leases, as compared to a flat 25 cents per ton royalty contained in the leases transacted during Republican administrations. A fair trades practices act also was passed and rural credits interest rates were lowered.

FARMER-LABOR PRINCIPLES UPHELD IN CONGRESS

The record of the Farmer-Labor Senators and Congressmen throughout has been one of unwavering support for every form of social legislation, and legislation designed to better the conditions of the people, socially and economically, regardless of who the sponsors were. It is also a consistent record of bitter and uncompromising opposition to reaction of every form.

The great body of social legislation enacted in recent years by Congress was done with the aid of the Farmer-Labor Senators and Representatives. No other party in Congress can claim so perfect a record for support of legislation beneficial to labor, the farmer, and the general welfare of the people. The Farmer-Labor Party in the Halls of Congress fought for these causes when they were unpopular, they manned their guns through the fury of every storm. They never deserted their posts.

SIGNIFICANCE OF THE FARMER-LABOR MOVEMENT

I have tried to indicate at various places in this account the significance of the farmer-labor movement. It sprang from the militancy of the farmers and workers in the years just preceding and during the first World War. Its basis was economic discontent. The people wanted more of the good things of life, they wanted an end to war, to depressions, and to corruption in government.

They were weary of the two old parties which had amply proved their inability to improve conditions. A party of their own had been a dream of many years' standing. In 1918 they formed it. It has lived to this day. It will grow beyond the borders of Minnesota in the near future—of that I am certain. It is destined to lead a great new national party—its objective the economic freedom of the common man.

SECURITY, PEACE, FREEDOM

During the 18 years that Farmer-Labor Representatives and Senators have worked in the Congress, and during the 8 years when the party ruled in Minnesota, great masses of people have come to realize that in Minnesota the farmers and workers were actually proving that their own party was possible. These masses looked then—and they look now—to the Farmer-Labor movement to lead them forward to security, peace, and freedom. Our party is a living, burning symbol of this desire. It could not be crushed, not by money, not by treachery, not by dissension, not by slander or abuse. We have shown the people a way to the future.

Down the years the party, to consider its work at home, has educated the people to think in terms of social and economic change. No man in Minnesota can win an election on his voice, his face, or even his party label. The people have been taught to look behind these things and find the program upon which he stands. Thus it was that in 1938 a Republican candidate stood no chance unless he pledged himself—no matter how hypocritical—to the Farmer-Labor program. He found it necessary to pose as something which he was not—a liberal.

FARMER-LABOR SUFFERS A SET-BACK IN 1938

The 1938 campaign unfortunately found the Farmer-Labor Party a house divided against itself. It is not for me here to point out the reasons for this disunion; recriminations will serve no purpose. We learned a bitter lesson—and one which, I am sure, will in the future result in a greater unity than ever before. Individual differences will be forgotten in rallying around a program which we need and which we all can support.

There is no denying that the Farmer-Labor Party suffered a severe set-back at the polls. We lost the governorship, and the other State officers. Liberal representation in both the upper and lower houses of the State legislature was drastically reduced. The party returned but one Congressman to Washington. We were caught during one of the temporary reactionary waves which swept the country, and the party's disunity made it impossible for liberals to hold back the sweep of reaction.

The people, however, now see the fraudulent nature of the Republican campaign. They have been educated in Minnesota to distinguish between genuine liberalism and fake liberalism. They may be fooled once, but they cannot be fooled a second time, even when conservatism comes to them streamlined and sugar-coated. They know it for the bitter pill that it is, and will not continue with that kind of medication. It does not agree with them.

RECURRENT DEPRESSIONS—FAKE LIBERALISM EXPOSED

What we have been experiencing in this country under the old political parties has been periods of recurrent depressions, interspersed with periods of so-called prosperity; and these periods of so-called prosperity have been prosperity in a relative sense only. At no time have the great masses of the people—the great masses of our citizens whose labor produces all our social wealth—felt a real sense of economic security. At no time have they been able to accumulate during periods of prosperity sufficient reserves—sufficient money, if you please—to take care of themselves and their families during the trying periods of depressions and for their old age. In fact, the standard of living of the masses has been high only in contrast with some other countries, but it has been very low indeed when the natural resources of our country and its ability to produce great wealth are taken into consideration.

What have been the reasons for these recurrent depressions? When the Democratic Party is in power the allegation has been that it is because business has no confidence. This, of course, is just so much dust thrown into the eyes of the people. It contains no element of truth whatever. Who ever heard of an automobile manufacturer refusing to manufacture automobiles that he could sell at a profit because he did not like the politics of the party in power?

Who ever heard of a radio manufacturer refusing to manufacture radios he could sell at a profit for the same reason? Or the Power Trust refusing to generate as much electricity as its customers wanted to consume? The claim of "lack of confidence" is a preposterous one.

"LACK OF CONFIDENCE" FAKE

Were such claims legitimate, we would have enjoyed permanent prosperity under Republican administrations, and the people never would have had occasion to turn their Government over to the Democratic Party. Could big business have had any more confidence than it did when the "great engineer," Herbert Hoover, sat in the White House? Hoover was the apostle of big business; and yet it was under Mr. Hoover that the country went into its deepest depression of all times.

The trouble is that neither the Republican Party nor the Democratic Party has had the courage—I will not say intelligence, since the best economic brains of the country have been at their disposal—to attempt to solve the fundamentals of our economic problem. The reason is that their solution would mean treading on the toes of the mighty. The Farmer-Labor Party has no "sacred cows" to protect.

The only legitimate reason there can be for a depression is when nature fails and there is not enough food to go around, like the famines of old. That has never been the case here. Neither overproduction nor lack of confidence can be accepted as valid reasons why people should go hungry.

ECONOMY OF SCARCITY MAKESHIFT

The fact that we have been compelled to resort to an economy of scarcity rather than to an economy of plenty is proof that neither of the old parties has found a real solution to the problem.

An economy of scarcity violates every moral concept—every rule of man and God.

From an economic standpoint, it is based on fallacy. It benefits not the great mass of the producers of wealth but rather the few individuals who already enjoy special benefits and special considerations under our Government.

When the Republicans were in power, we dumped foodstuffs by the hundreds of thousands of tons into the ocean to keep these foodstuffs from the hungry. On the basis of a presumed surplus, the grain dealers, who really have been the price fixers for the farmers, beat down the price to the level where the farmers did not even receive cost of production for their labors. Then, on the basis of presumed scarcity, the grain gamblers invariably shot the prices up after the farmer had nothing left to sell.

SCARCITY A FALSE ECONOMY

In recent years, we have been telling our farmers to produce less foodstuffs, not because there are not enough consumers to absorb these products but because the people did not have enough money with which to buy essentials—clothes, food, and housing. At the same time, our factories have been operating at less than 60 percent of capacity—in some years much less—because we confessedly did not know how to get the wealth that these factories could produce to the people who need this wealth badly. Where is there moral justification for such an economy?

The present national emergency brought home to many people a fact that liberals and progressives of this country have known right along—that an economy based upon scarcity contributes neither to our strength as a nation nor to the happiness and prosperity of the average citizen. It is axiomatic that we cannot became wealthier as a nation by producing less wealth. There is something drastically wrong with it all.

SPENDING ONLY REMEDY DEVISED—NATIONAL DEFENSE

Thus far, Government spending is the only way we have been able to devise to give the masses greater purchasing power; but vast as this spending has been, it has been woefully insufficient, even though it has brought food, shelter, and clothing of a kind to the needy, which many have begrudged them.

And the only effort of Government in recent years to reduce spending and balance the Budget brought about an immediate business recession from which we have not yet recovered. That was when Wall Street wrote the ticket. Obviously, Wall Street medicine is not good medicine for the people.

Now we are going in for Government spending in a really big way, not ostensibly to relieve unemployment and to bring about presumed prosperity but to prepare for national defense. I am not opposed to spending money for commonsense national defense. I believe that our Nation should become so strong that no other nation or group of nations can ever successfully attack us.

NEW PROSPERITY IN OFFING—MORE NATIONAL DEFENSE

But I am not talking about Government spending in terms of national defense but rather in terms of our national economy. While conservatives were opposed to Government spending when it meant saving of homes and keeping our people alive, they are not opposed to spending for national defense, because they think they are merely paying high insurance premiums to keep the war-profiteering system under which they have accumulated millions alive. Incidentally, they think that they can pass a large share of the increased taxes for national defense on to the common people.

Of course, the results of this kind of spending from an economic point of view will be almost identical with the other kind of spending we have been used to. We can look forward to a so-called prosperity spurt. But when the spending is over and the millions put to work thereby will again be pushed out on the streets, making the rounds daily at factories with signs on the doors, "No help wanted," we will find ourselves in an even sadder predicament than we are in today, unless in the meantime we go about the task of tackling our economic problem from its fundamental aspects.

ECONOMIC SOLUTION BEING DELAYED

What of the aftermath if we do not find now the permanent answer to the problem? We must not forget the results of the last war economy—the flare of presumed prosperity, with its stock-market boom, the mad gamble, and then the day of reckoning, with its blasted homes, destroyed firesides, broken hearts, suicides, a bankrupt agriculture, an army of unemployed of such staggering proportions that we believed impossible, business failures, bank crashes—a nation fast losing its faith in democracy, because democracy had failed to give the people the substance of life.

Economists know that what we are doing now is only a makeshift arrangement—supplying merely a sedative to the patient, but not a real cure for the disease. We must develop an economy based on plenty, able to distribute to the people the vast wealth which our tremendous resources and our gigantic industrial and agricultural plant is able to produce.

To bring about that kind of an economy is the chief aim of the Farmer-Labor Party.

A country's greatness is measured not by the number of its great masses of its citizens. The national emergency has taught us that an economy of scarcity constitutes an element of national weakness.

DEMOCRACY IN ACTION—WALL STREET TUNE NOT FOR PEOPLE

I have said that the Farmer-Labor Party represents democracy in action—real democracy, under which government becomes the servant of all the people and not the handmaiden of the few. It is precisely because of the way that democracy, so-called, has been administered by the old parties that it is in peril today.

Let us make democracy work. Let everyone under our democracy have a genuine stake in that democracy. Let democracy give real economic security to our people, and this country will become so strong and so powerful that it will be immune from attack, both from within and from without. This is even more essential than military preparedness, because a happy and contented people will always be the Nation's strongest defenders.

FARMER-LABOR PARTY POINTS WAY

The Farmer-Labor Party of Minnesota points the way. It has shown that a common people's government can be made to work, to win elections, to educate the people to approach politics with clearness, and to formulate a definite program possible of accomplishment. It has sent good men to the statehouse, to the legislature, and to the Congress. It not only promises reforms but it produces them. It shows that a national Farmer-Labor Party is not only possible but that it is absolutely necessary. The great masses of the people will in the not distant future win America back for themselves.

At the dinner of the famous Gridiron Club late in 1931, Floyd B. Olson, our distinguished Governor, predicted that a new national insurgent party would spring up to rescue the people from the terrible pressure of economic collapse. That prediction will some day come true.

Mr. President, I ask that the bibliography on the Farmer-Labor Party of Minnesota and references to magazine and newspaper articles regarding that party be printed in the RECORD.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. GIBSON in the chair). Is there objection?

There being no objection, the matters were ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

THURSDAY, AUGUST 15, 1940

The House met at 12 o'clock noon.

Rev. Bernard Braskamp, D. D., pastor of Gunton Temple Memorial Presbyterian Church, Washington, D. C., offered the following prayer:

O Thou condescending God, grant that the dew of Thy grace and wisdom may descend this day and abide upon Thy servants.

We pray that Thou wilt touch the spirit of humanity to a loftier melody. May we be lifted far above vain wishes and desires of our own. Help us to grow in knowledge of the nobler ways of thinking and living.

Emancipate us from all rebellious and cynical tempers of mind lest we become too faithless to hope and too willful to learn. May we never fall into a contentious spirit, but follow peace with all men. Let us ever be courteous and easy to be entreated; willing to forgive, ready to confess our faults, eager to make amends, desiring to keep the law of love.

Show us how we may enter into the largeness, the freedom, and the gentleness of the lowly Nazarene, who walked the road of the loving heart. In His name we pray. Amen.

The Journal of the proceedings of yesterday was read and approved.

ORDERING NATIONAL GUARD, RESERVES INTO ACTIVE MILITARY SERVICE

Mr. MAY. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of Senate Joint Resolution 286, to strengthen the common defense and to authorize the President to order members and units of reserve components and retired personnel of the Regular Army into active military service.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the House resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of Senate Joint Resolution 286, with Mr. WOODRUM of Virginia in the chair.

The Clerk read the title of the joint resolution.

Mr. ANDREWS. Mr. Chairman, I rise in opposition to the pending amendment. To refresh our memory, when the Committee rose last night we had under consideration the amendment offered by the gentleman from Connecticut [Mr. MILLER], the amendment being on page 2, at the top of the page, which would strike out the limitation of the Western Hemisphere, and substitute in lieu thereof the continental limits of the United States, its island possessions, including the Philippine Islands, the Panama Canal Zone, and Alaska.

At the top of page 2 there is a proviso in the bill that the members and units of the reserve components of the Army of the United States ordered into active Federal service under this authority shall not be employed beyond the limits of the Western Hemisphere, and so forth. In other words, this would affect not only the National Guard, but all reserve components, which includes Reserve officers serving with the Regular Army.

About a year ago the Regular Army had a strength of 165,000 enlisted men and approximately 14,000 officers. It now has an authorized strength of 375,000 enlisted men but a corresponding increase in the Regular Army commissioned strength has not been made, since we are proceeding in accordance with the wise provisions of the National Defense Act which provides for reserve components to reinforce and supplement the Regular Army in time of emergency. To provide the larger officer requirements for expanding the Regular Army to 375,000 enlisted men, there have been called to active duty a large number of Reserve officers to the extent that approximately two-thirds of the officers on duty with Regular Army troop units in the continental United States and one-third in the Panama Canal Department and the Hawaiian Department are Reserve officers. A large part of the pilots of the Air Corps are also Reserve officers. The acceptance of this amendment would prevent the use of any Regular Army unit outside of the continental limits of the United States or its possessions without first denuding the unit of its Reserve personnel, a measure which would deprive it of the overwhelming bulk of the junior officers actually in command of the troops. No airplanes could be sent into the Caribbean area for any purpose unless manned entirely by Regular Army personnel, a process which would cut down the size and effectiveness of the force that could be employed. No Regular Army unit could be sent across the borders of the Canal Zone for any purpose without first withdrawing the Reserve officers from it. These are only two examples of the restrictive powers of this amendment. I strongly doubt the wisdom of tying the hands of the War Department by so restricting the use of our armed forces under the conditions which have warranted such large appropriations for creating a more effective national defense. [Applause.]

Mr. MILLER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. ANDREWS. Yes.

Mr. MILLER. I said yesterday that I would be the last man who would come to the Well of the House and do anything that I thought would tie the hands of the President of the United States. I recognize there is a great deal of merit in what the gentleman has pointed out. The gentleman has pointed out that this bill is limited to those called under the provisions of the act, and would not affect Reserve officers now in the service. I have in mind a perfecting amendment, which if the House adopts this amendment, I shall offer, which will distinctly limit it to the National Guard.

Mr. ANDREWS. As I understand it then the perfecting amendment which the gentleman proposes to offer would place the limitations only on the National Guard ordered into duty.

Mr. MILLER. That is correct.

Mr. ALEXANDER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. ANDREWS. Yes.

Mr. ALEXANDER. As I understand it we let go of the Philippines in a few years now.

Mr. ANDREWS. In 1946.

Mr. ALEXANDER. Are we going to send the National Guard over there to shed their blood?

Mr. ANDREWS. I personally do not believe there is any possibility of any National Guard troops being sent beyond continental United States, even to possessions, but why tie the hands of the War Department in a rather critical situation when no one can forecast what may happen in the future.

Mr. ALEXANDER. Either we are going to get away from the Philippines, or we are going there and fight for them. We have voted to get rid of them.

Mr. ANDREWS. There might be a point in an amendment which would remove the Philippine Islands. Personally, I would not care much, one way or the other.

Mr. MARTIN of Iowa. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. ANDREWS. Yes.

Mr. MARTIN of Iowa. The point made by the gentleman from New York is one that can easily be corrected by limiting this to the National Guard. I have spoken in favor of this amendment. I am decidedly in favor of that limitation, confining it to the National Guard, so as to eliminate the possibility of the difficulty which the gentleman has referred to.

Mr. ANDREWS. The gentleman from Connecticut has just stated that he will offer such perfecting amendment.

Mr. VORYS of Ohio. Would the gentleman have any objection or would the Army have any objection to permitting discharges upon request of Reserve officers and National Guard men when they are called in? If the gentleman has no such objection and thereafter the men who are called in come in voluntarily, then there is no need for restricting their activities.

Mr. ANDREWS. My understanding is that the War Department will give free ear to reasonable requests of officers of that type before ordering them out.

[Here the gavel fell.]

Mr. WADSWORTH. Mr. Chairman, I rise in opposition to the amendment offered by the gentleman from Connecticut [Mr. MILLER]. I ask unanimous consent that I may proceed for an additional 5 minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from New York?

There was no objection.

Mr. WADSWORTH. Mr. Chairman, I am emboldened to make that request, not because I am confident that I am master of this subject, but it is so important from the standpoint of sound military policy that perhaps I may be justified in speaking a little longer than the usual 5 minutes.

I am opposed to the amendment offered by the gentleman from Connecticut because it is in violation of the spirit and intent of the National Defense Act of 1920. You may remember that before the World War those troops which we now call the National Guard of the United States were known as the Organized Militia and as such they had no Federal duty except to repel invasion. They were organized and maintained under the militia clause of the Constitution. So clearly was that status understood and accepted in those ancient days that when we went into the World War there was a provision inserted—and it had to be inserted—in the draft law providing for the drafting into the Federal service of the Organized Militia. And they were drafted into service en masse by regiments—all the men and all the officers. The guard went to the war. They came back, 13 splendid, soldierly divisions in the Federal service. There are men upon this floor who served in some of those divisions. When they came back they came to the Congress and said:

> If you are going to write a military policy for the United States, for God's sake do not make us militiamen any more if you can help it; make us potential Federal soldiers. Put us on an equality, when we are ordered into Federal service, with the Regular. We do not want to be spit upon any longer. We do not want to be despised. We do not want to be called tin soldiers and home guards. Put something in your national law to the effect that when ordered into Federal service the Regular and the guardsman stand upon the same plane, enjoy the same privileges, and carry the same obligations as Federal soldiers.

So we did it, at the earnest request of the citizen soldiers of the United States, and today, under the terms of this resolution, if the guard is ordered into the active military service of the United States, its officers and men become automatically and instantly Federal soldiers; not militiamen; and their officers are interchangeable with Regular officers of equal rank. You can put a Regular officer in a National Guard unit and you can put a National Guard officer into a Regular unit without any change in prestige or power. In other words, we tried to build one Army of the United States—not two or three unrelated armies. [Applause.]

Now, this amendment destroys that whole idea. In its effect it says to the National Guard, "You are no longer anything much more than militiamen. You cannot leave the country. You are not like the Regular. You are beneath him. You do not belong in the Army, really. You are a sort of an adjunct, the way you were back in 1915 and 1916," the very thing the guard does not want.

I beg and implore that the House do not adopt this amendment. It is bad military policy. I hope that the judgment of men will not be swayed by personal animosities. [Applause.] I mean that. I am thinking of the defense of our country. The guard is to be ordered into the Federal service under the terms of this bill, not merely for training. That is incidental and highly important, but to become available as Federal soldiers to meet any emergency which may arise in the Western Hemisphere until 1942.

To be consistent in this matter if we are going to say to a part of the Army of the United States, "You shall not do a certain thing," why do you not say it to the whole Army? Why do you not say to the marines, "You shall not leave the coastal waters of the United States?" Why do you not say to the Navy, "Never leave the coastal waters of the United States or its possessions"?

Can we not have one Navy, one Army, one national defense? That is the spirit of the law we put on the statute books 20 years ago after the experience of the World War and the bitter experience of decades behind it under the old-time militia system.

Let me recite to you an incident that demonstrates to you what I mean. Back in the War of 1812 there was a prolonged and bitter campaign on the Niagara frontier. The United States had about 2,000 Regular troops there. In 1813, I think it was, the Militia of the State of New York 7,000 strong—think of it!—was ordered into the service of the United States for that war. They moved to the Niagara frontier and camped along the bank of the river. Across the river from the village of Lewistown stands Queenstown Heights. On those heights today you will see a monument, the Brock Monument, erected in memory of a British general who was killed in the battle. The British were entrenched on the heights. With their artillery fire they made the American side exceedingly uncomfortable. A defensive offensive by the American Army was planned, and the Regulars crossed the river, scrambled up the bank on the other side and stormed the trenches. They got about halfway up and could not get any farther. The British and Canadians kept bringing in reinforcements.

Orders went back to the New York Militia to cross the river—7,000—and win the battle. They would not do it. Why? Because they were not permitted to leave the United States. It was in time of war. I hear the suggestion that it was in time of war. It was.

Can we predict every single emergency that might arise overnight? Can we not at least visualize something happening with lightning rapidity in the West Indies? And are we to say that in that event we must convene the Congress, introduce a bill, have hearings on it, bring it to the floor, and debate it to determine whether or not half the Army of the United States can be used to meet the emergency; I hope not!

Mr. SHORT. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WADSWORTH. I yield.

Mr. SHORT. If we are successfully to defend the Panama Canal, it may become very necessary for us to send our soldiers, including the National Guard, far beyond the borders of our Territorial possessions. [Applause.]

Mr. WADSWORTH. Certainly. We cannot tell about these things, Mr. Chairman. We cannot take chances. Here are 240,000 organized troops, but as soon as you order them into the Federal service you are going to say that the Federal Government must not use them beyond our borders.

Mr. McCORMACK. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WADSWORTH. I yield.

Mr. McCORMACK. We have completed a very important conference at Habana—one of great import to the nations of the Western Hemisphere. I would like to get the gentleman's reactions. If this amendment were adopted, what message would we be sending to those countries and to the world?

Mr. WADSWORTH. I suppose it would be to the effect that we are about 50 percent in earnest in that agreement.

Mr. McCORMACK. And that means nothing.

Mr. WADSWORTH. About 50 percent, because we are holding off from possible enforcement of that agreement 50 percent of our armed forces.

Mr. MILLER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WADSWORTH. I yield.

Mr. MILLER. Can the gentleman conceive a situation arising that would make it necessary to send all of the Army of the United States out of the country with such speed that Congress could not take the necessary action to declare war?

Mr. WADSWORTH. I think it is improbable, but I am not going to take that chance.

Mr. MAY. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WADSWORTH. I yield.

Mr. MAY. What might be the result of our failure to defeat this amendment upon the South American countries that have recently signed the agreement with regard to which the gentleman from Massachusetts just asked a question? Might they not turn in another direction?

Mr. WADSWORTH. I do not know what they would do. I suppose they would say as I said to the gentleman from Massachusetts, that we were about 50 percent in earnest.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WADSWORTH. I yield to the distinguished Speaker of the House.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Is it not the opinion of the gentleman from New York that this amendment is a severe indictment against the patriotism of the National Guard of this country? And does it not put us in the position of saying that if there are 10 men from my home town who are in the Regular Army and 10 in the National Guard who are neighbors and on terms of social equality, that we can send 10 abroad, but 10 cannot go abroad because of this limitation?

Mr. WADSWORTH. Mr. Chairman, I think this amendment puts the Guard back where it does not want to be.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Has the gentleman from New York heard any remonstrance from the National Guard seeking to avoid the same responsibility the Regular Army is given?

Mr. WADSWORTH. None, and under the terms of the enlistment contract entered into by every guardsman and every officer of the guard there is an oath to obey the orders of the President of the United States when he, responsive to the authority of Congress, orders them into the Federal service; and every one of them takes that oath with his eyes open. That is the oath they begged us to submit to them.

Now when we are about to authorize their being ordered into the Federal service, on the eve of having done that, we are going to desert the very system they were so long in building up.

Mr. ROUTZOHN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WADSWORTH. I yield.

Mr. ROUTZOHN. The gentleman, I am sure, is aware of the fact that declarations of war these days are obsolete, that nations are plunged into war without any formal declaration. If we pass this bill as the gentleman proposes we will be abdicating our position and our prerogative of declaring war and granting to one man the privilege of sending our armies into a foreign war. [Applause.]

Mr. WADSWORTH. I cannot agree with what the gentleman from Ohio has said. We are not adding to the power of the President any more than he already possesses with the Regular Army, the Navy, and the Marine Corps. Would the gentleman from Ohio propose a similar amendment relating to the Regular Army, the Navy, and the Marine Corps?

Mr. ROUTZOHN. No; but the gentleman would change a contract which was agreed to by those who entered the National Guard.

Mr. WADSWORTH. I have endeavored to describe that contract. [Applause.]

[Here the gavel fell.]

Mr. MARTIN of Iowa rose.

Mr. MAY. Mr. Chairman, the gentleman seeking recognition on the other side of the House has spoken on the amendment once and in favor of it. I think we have consumed a vast amount of time, 30 minutes yesterday and 15 minutes this morning. I think it is about time to vote.

The CHAIRMAN. Is the gentleman from Iowa seeking recognition?

Mr. MAY. Mr. Chairman, I move that debate do now close. Mr. Chairman, I withdraw the motion.

Mr. BENDER rose.

The CHAIRMAN. For what purpose does the gentleman from Ohio rise?

Mr. BENDER. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last four words.

Mr. Chairman, I shall yield to the gentleman from Iowa in my time.

Mr. MAY. Will the gentleman yield to me for a unanimous-consent request?

Mr. BENDER. No; I will not yield. I have the floor and I shall not yield.

Mr. Chairman, in line with the performance of the chairman of the Committee on Military Affairs on yesterday, he evidenced an intolerance with anyone who wanted to speak on this measure at that time, and the same attitude is indicated by the gentleman today. He said that everybody should not be permitted to speak on this measure. Well, now, we are all Members of this House. This is an important matter and most certainly, whether we agree with the gentleman's position or not, we have a right to speak, and this is the time to speak. [Applause.]

There is no need for such haste. We can stay here another day, if necessary, to discuss this measure. This business of ramming down the throats of the American people something that is of such vast importance and has the vast implications that this measure has, in a short space of time, I say is entirely out of order and entirely out of keeping with American principles.

Mr. MARTIN of Iowa. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BENDER. I yield to the gentleman from Iowa.

Mr. MARTIN of Iowa. I have yet to discover any part of this amendment that will in any way serve notice to the Latin American countries that we do not intend to keep up our obligations in that direction.

Mr. MAY. Mr. Chairman, I did not hear the gentleman's statement.

Mr. MARTIN of Iowa. There is nothing in the proposed amendment that will serve notice on the Latin American countries that we propose to withdraw from our obligations down that way. They do not ask us to concentrate all of this power in the President to send the National Guard to all parts of the world and, as far as the argument of the gentleman from New York [Mr. WADSWORTH] is concerned, there is a distinction between the National Guard and the Regular Army in the proposed bill itself. The Regular Army can be sent anywhere in the world and you are proposing here to limit the reserve components of the Army to the Western Hemisphere. Is that not a distinction between the Regular Army and the Reserve components of the Army, and is not the difference between the provisions of the proposed bill and this amendment one of degree only. [Applause.]

Mr. MARCANTONIO. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BENDER. I yield to the gentleman from New York.

Mr. MARCANTONIO. In regard to our relationship to South America, I think it is well known to every person living in South America and Central America that the use of the National Guard and the threat to send it down there is not looked upon as part of a good neighbor or pan-American policy, but, on the contrary, will be looked upon with a good deal of suspicion for the furtherance of an imperialistic policy on the part of the United States. [Applause.]

Mr. BENDER. Mr. Chairman, I asked for this time so that the gentleman from Iowa would have an opportunity to be heard.

In conclusion permit me to suggest that there will be a greater degree of tolerance shown by the members of this committee for the Members who desire to be heard. They have an honest point of view. It may differ radically from the point of view of the chairman, but in this House, where we are all elected in the same manner to represent our constituency, certainly we have a right to be heard. [Applause.]

Mr. MAY. Mr. Chairman, I should like to reach some agreement, if I can, with respect to time on this amendment. On yesterday we consumed 25 minutes on it, and we have been here nearly 30 minutes now.

May I say in answer to the gentleman from Ohio, who talked so much about intolerance, that there were 4 hours' general debate on this resolution, and we were hunting around yesterday evening for gentlemen on the other side of the House to discuss the measure. The gentleman from Ohio made no effort to speak then.

Mr. Chairman, I would like to know how many gentlemen want to discuss the amendment in order to arrive at some agreement as to time.

Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that all debate on this amendment close in 30 minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr MAY]?

There was no objection.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair recognizes the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. ROUTZOHN].

Mr. ROUTZOHN. Mr. Chairman, last evening when the Committee rose I was on my feet seeking recognition from the Chair for the purpose of addressing the House in reply to some of the arguments presented by some of those who oppose the amendment under consideration. I noted that opponents of the amendment were adroitly evading discussion of the merits of the amendment and resorting to aspersions and innuendo, impugning the motives of the proponents of the amendment, and implying that we, the proponents, are being actuated by political considerations, and are, perforce, unpatriotic. It is seldom that I request the privilege of the floor and impose my views upon you. I have preferred to listen to the members of the committee in charge of the proposed legislation then under consideration and others who had previously given time and attention to the subject, satisfying myself upon the merits and basing my vote upon a judicious consideration of the arguments presented.

I approached consideration of this particular bill in that attitude, save and except that my prior convictions impel me to favor the calling into active service for intensive military and technical training the National Guard and the Reserve components of our armed forces.

Until a few years ago I had a commission in the Officers' Reserve. I was proud of it, and wish I had it now. By giving it back to me and calling me into active service your beloved country and mine can obtain an excellent soldier in exchange for a Congressman of questionable ability.

Furthermore, I am proud to have an only son in the officers' Reserve, and he is with troops, in the Infantry branch. He has already forwarded his reply card to the Fifth Corps Area signifying his availability for service. He will relinquish a lucrative position to do this, but to him and to his father his patriotic duty transcends all else.

All I ask now is the privilege of voting for a bill that has for its sincere and honest object and purpose the training of an army which will, if, as, and when war comes, be able to successfully cope with the combined forces of all the dictators on earth.

I therefore resent implications that to support this amendment is to be guilty of playing a sordid game of politics and to be unpatriotic, disloyal, if you please, to our great and noble Government.

Is it playing politics, my colleagues, for us to say that the only emergency that now exists is the dire necessity of equipping and training an army and navy for the national defense?

Is it playing politics for us to stipulate by express terms that our Army shall have that training on American soil?

Is it playing politics for us to uphold and retain the constitutional prerogative of the Congress by refusing to grant to the Executive the sole right to determine whether our boys shall be sent across our borders into foreign territory?

Is it playing politics for us to say that not one mother's son shall set foot on foreign soil unless and until the Congress by appropriate action shall prescribe or sanction such a move?

Is it playing politics for us to recognize the fact that in modern warfare declarations of war are obsolete; that armies wage war without awaiting the formality of a declaration of war; and that the presence of our boys on foreign soil imperils them and us as well?

Is it playing politics for us to say that unless and until the Monroe Doctrine is violated no emergency exists that would warrant our boys being used to police the Western Hemisphere, part of which is twice as far removed from us as is the continent of Europe?

Is it, my Democratic colleagues, in all good conscience and fair dealing, playing politics to refuse to permit this gesture of approval of what the President and the Secretary of State may have secretly promised our Central and South American neighbors?

By your insisting on our upholding the hands of the President, without knowing what he promised, being in the dark as to that as much as we were kept uninformed and in the dark as to what he promised the King and Queen of England last year, is it true that the proponents of this amendment are playing politics; or are you, my Democratic colleagues, merely laying a smoke screen to hide the politics that are behind your opposition thereto? [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair recognizes the gentleman from Texas [Mr. LUTHER A. JOHNSON].

Mr. LUTHER A. JOHNSON. Mr. Chairman, I believe my service in this House has demonstrated one thing, that I do not often impose myself upon the House. I do not rise now just for the purpose of making a speech or to get my name in the RECORD, but to register my vigorous protest against the pending amendment. It ought to be defeated not only because it will jeopardize our national defense but its adoption will prevent our defense of the Monroe Doctrine, and, furthermore, it will be contrary and contradictory to our commitments to the other 20 American republics, with whom our Government recently conferred at Habana. Its adoption would give the right for these other countries to believe that we were not sincere and would not carry out our commitments at the Habana Conference. Having declared our policy both as to the Monroe Doctrine and as to cooperation with the other American republics, we should pass no legislation that will give cause for anyone either in this hemisphere or the dictators of Europe to doubt our sincerity. It would be fatal both here and abroad to contradict our declared policy by now declaring that we would not send out National Guard troops to defend it. The amendment strikes at the very policy that we have been trying to carry out with reference to our relations with the Central and South American republics. Gentlemen say it will not affect it because we will send some of our soldiers, but we will not send others. The author of the amendment says, "Can you visualize any condition arising so fast that we would have to send all the soldiers down there at once?"

Mr. MARCANTONIO and Mr. MARTIN of Iowa rose.

Mr. LUTHER A. JOHNSON. I am sorry to be unable to yield; my time is too limited. If I complete my statement before my time expires, I shall be glad to do so.

I wish to say to the gentleman who propounded that inquiry that if he had talked with some of those from the democratic nations that have fallen under the dictators' attack, as members of the Foreign Affairs Committee have been privileged to do, he would realize that situations arise rapidly in these times and that it is because democracies do not function as rapidly as dictatorships that some of those democracies have fallen. The gentleman knows as well as I know that it would be impossible to bring Congress back here in time to pass the needed legislation if an invasion should take place, and it should happen to be that, available at that time in that section, were only members of the National Guard. Suppose an invasion of a foreign enemy should come upon the shores of Mexico, which might happen, in what position would the United States be to defend itself if we hog-tied our National Guard by a restriction of this kind? We saw the need of it in 1916 when we had trouble down on the border, and the need of it is ten-fold greater now than it was then.

What if an invading army should be sent to one of the islands near the Panama Canal that belongs to some other country, what if a military attack were made? Does the House or this Committee believe we would be acting sensibly to say that we could not send our National Guard, our Regular soldiers, or any other kind of soldiers there to defend and protect our rights? [Applause.]

[Here the gavel fell.]

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair recognizes the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. JOHNS].

Mr. JOHNS. Mr. Chairman——

Mr. MARTIN of Iowa. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. JOHNS. I yield to the gentleman from Iowa.

Mr. MARTIN of Iowa. In response to the speech just made, I should like to make this comment: As I read the proposed amendment, it does not signify that we will not send troops down there; it is only that we will not send them down there without congressional sanction.

Mr. LUTHER A. JOHNSON. Yes; but it would be too late to get congressional sanction if an invasion should occur.

Mr. MARCANTONIO. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. JOHNS. I yield to the gentleman from New York.

Mr. MARCANTONIO. Is there any gentleman in this House who doubts that in the event of an emergency it would take this Congress more than 24 hours to give congressional sanction?

Mr. JOHNS. There has been a lot said here about calling back Congress. As far as I am concerned, Congress is in session, and if I can keep it here I am going to do so during these times. [Applause.]

I have listened this morning, and I do not believe there would be any more excitement if Hitler landed in New York with an army than there is around here this morning about a bill that is supposed to be to train some soldiers for service. This idea of wanting to talk about sending soldiers down into South America to protect somebody is all wrong. I would not have risen here this morning and talked at all, but I have an amendment similar to this one at the desk, and that is the reason I say this amendment ought to be adopted. The people back home feel that we are not going to go to war tomorrow. They feel that we are going to train somebody to get ready for war. If they thought for a moment we were going to pass this bill so that if it became necessary the President of the United States could send somebody down to South America to fight tomorrow, of course, they would not be for it. They do not believe there is any danger of this kind.

As far as the National Guard is concerned, it is not making any protest. They are good soldiers. They have their superior officers, and if they do any talking, they do their talking to them instead of to the country.

I hope the amendment offered by the gentleman from Connecticut will be accepted, and if it is not accepted, I am going to vote against this bill.

Mr. RICH. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. JOHNS. I yield to the gentleman from Pennsylvania.

Mr. RICH. We were talking about rushing this legislation through. I have every regard in the world for the Chairman of the Committee, but since he said that we had 4 hours of debate on this bill, let me call your attention to the exact fact. The rule called for 4 hours of debate, but we started debate yesterday at 1 o'clock and finished it at 3:30. That is two hours and a half of debate, not 4 hours as stated, that we had; he was in error and meant we were supposed to have had 4 hours. It seems to me, with all due respect to the Members of Congress themselves, those who are in favor of this bill and those who are not, that we have lots of time and we can take lots of time because we are supposed to be in session to see that this Nation does not get into war. If we keep on the way we are going, I can see nothing but war ahead. Not only war but dictatorship. I do not know which would be the most detrimental to our Nation. I prefer war to dictatorship myself. With war we can probably survive as a country and retain our form of government and our liberty and our freedom, not so with dictatorship; we lose our form of government, we lose our liberty, and we lose our freedom. Let me say to the Members of Congress we do not have to have either war or dictatorship if we just consider carefully and wisely what we, as Members of Congress, do in passing our laws. Let us take our time and wisely debate this bill; it will be best for our country I am sure.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MASON] is recognized for 3 minutes.

Mr. MASON. Mr. Chairman, I tried to get time yesterday in the general debate, but I was told that all the time was taken. Therefore it seems to me we are laboring under a misapprehension about the time.

Now, members of the Committee, there is not a Member in this House, in my estimation, who does not agree and concede that there is a necessity for proper training of the National Guard, and if this bill was simply a bill to provide for training, as the country has been informed, I do not believe there would be 10 votes in this House against the bill. That is my own personal impression. If, however, this bill is a bill to authorize the Commander in Chief of the Army and Navy to send the National Guard in peacetime outside of the territory of the United States, then that is a different proposition, and that is what we are now told the provisions of the bill cover.

Mr. ANDREWS. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MASON. Not at this time.

If this bill is a measure to declare by the Congress a national emergency, as the chairman of the Military Affairs Committee indicated yesterday, then that is a different proposition and we ought to know what we are voting upon when we vote upon this bill.

These questions are all involved in the passage of this bill. One of the Members yesterday said that the only national emergency we are facing today is an emergency for training the National Guard, and that is what the bill, on the surface, is supposed to do. If that is the emergency, then the amendment of the gentleman from Connecticut [Mr. MILLER], if adopted, will not offer one particle of interference to the training of the National Guard, because we can train them much better on our own soil. For that reason I think the amendment should be adopted, and as one Member of this House I shall vote for this bill if it limits the training of these men to training on our own soil, but if that provision is not adopted I shall vote against the bill. [Applause.]

[Here the gavel fell.]

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment——

Mr. ANDREWS. Mr. Chairman, under the unanimous-consent agreement the time was extended to 1:30.

The CHAIRMAN. Provided Members claimed the time, but if no one seeks recognition a vote on the amendment is in order.

Mr. SUMNERS of Texas. Mr. Chairman, I ask for recognition.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Texas is recognized for 3 minutes.

Mr. SUMNERS of Texas. Mr. Chairman, I have been very much interested in the discussion of this proposed amendment. It seems to me that this situation analyzes itself out about this way. This is a bill providing for the calling into active service of the National Guard. There is nothing in the bill indicating what is to be the disposition of the National Guard except they may not be sent beyond continental America and possessions. This amendment, so far as I can judge, seems to have arisen out of an apprehension, to be candid about it, that the President might send the militia somewhere and thereby do a provocative act. Now, looking at it from that standpoint we know that if this amendment were adopted it would not have the slightest effect on the President's power to do what the proponents of this amendment call provocative acts. He would have the same power to send American troops which he would have if the amendment were not adopted.

I want to make that clear, and it seems to me that ought to be an important point. The President would still be in command of the Army and the Navy and could send American troops anywhere that he could send them if this amendment were not adopted. Is not that true? If that is true, then why are we so concerned about adopting an amendment which these gentlemen who are connected with the Foreign Affairs Committee say would embarrass our situation with nations in South America?

We are all here wanting to do what is right about the matter. I thought I would submit this one thought for the consideration of my friend.

Mr. JOHNS. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SUMNERS of Texas. I yield to the gentleman.

Mr. JOHNS. Does the gentleman think the President of the United States would be so liable to do just what he has the power to do, or what you say he has the power to do, if the Congress of the United States limited that power?

Mr. SUMNERS of Texas. But the point is, I will say to the gentleman from Wisconsin, you are not limiting his power by this amendment. He would still have the power to send the Regular Army anywhere he could send the National Guard without the amendment. The presence of the Regular Army anywhere would certainly be just as provocative as the presence of the National Guard would be.

[Here the gavel fell.]

Mr. MAY. Mr. Chairman, I rise in opposition to the amendment. This is the most vital stroke at the effectiveness of the legislation that could possibly be made if it is adopted. It is practically a nullification of the whole purpose of the legislation. The National Guard constitutes what you might say are the reserves in the rear. If this amendment is adopted, it would put the Army in the position, if it desired to cross the Rio Grande, where it could go over with some of the Regular Establishment, and leave the National Guard behind completely paralyzing the force and effectiveness of our armed forces if they were confronted with a perilous position or situation. It would shackle the hands of the commanding general.

I call attention now to the specific declaration of policy that came from the Republican side of the House. In January 1939 when we were adopting the National Defense Act, the gentleman from New York [Mr. ANDREWS], ranking member of the Committee on Military Affairs, a brave and fearless soldier of the World War and a most able member of the House Military Affairs Committee, who had the floor and yielded himself time, made a brief statement in support of the bill and then yielded to the gentleman from New York, Mr. WADSWORTH, and the gentleman from New York [Mr. WADSWORTH] in the time yielded to him presented to the House what the minority side of the House had declared in writing to be the military policy and the foreign policy of the minority side of the House at that time. We were advised at that time that that policy had been agreed to at a meeting of the committee on that side of the House, and here is what they said at that time in speaking of the Monroe Doctrine:

> Obviously, our Military Establishment must be adequate to carry out the obligation so clearly implied in the Monroe Doctrine—the obligation to prevent the extension of foreign political domination through military action in the Western Hemisphere. This may well be considered as part of the supreme obligation to defend the continental United States. We thus envision our own defense. Without the Panama Canal we would be sadly handicapped. It is our life line and must be maintained.

Here it is proposed to adopt an amendment that if the National Guard of the United States be sent to Panama, while on that single strip of land within the jurisdiction of continental United States, we would be barred at the boundary line at the north and the south, and that would mean ineffectiveness, that would mean perhaps defeat of any effort of our Army in that area, where it would be defending the very lifeline of the American defense system, the defense of continental United States. This amendment would destroy effectively the very item of policy agreed to almost unanimously by this House in the resolution in which we declared that we would not permit any foreign country to encroach on the Western Hemisphere, enacted within the last 30 days by an almost unanimous vote.

Mr. EBERHARTER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MAY. Yes.

Mr. EBERHARTER. I call the attention of the House to the fact that the news dispatches from Mexico City state that the Senate of Mexico unanimously approved a resolution, which had previously been passed by the House of Representatives of that country, conscripting all available citizens of Mexico between the ages of 18 and 45, which shows the trend of these times, and I think this House should not adopt this amendment.

Mr. MAY. In other words, here is a peaceful neighbor, just south of the Rio Grande, that says to the American continent, to the Western Hemisphere, to the republics of South America, to this great country of ours, we conscript our manpower, and yet we are asked here today to make it impossible for us to even call the National Guard as a civilian component of our Army. Dr. John R. Sampy, of Louisville, Ky., president of the Southern Baptist Theological Seminary and one of America's greatest clergymen, celebrated the sixtieth anniversary of his church life and delivered an address strongly favoring compulsory military training as the only truly democratic system of providing an army. In the course of his remarks, the noted theologian, now 77 years of age, stated our position as a Nation in a striking manner. He is quoted as having said, "The United States is like unto a fat, juicy turkey on a low fence on the night before Thanksgiving, with a hungry bulldog approaching on one side and not a gun within a mile on the other side." If this great Christian visualizes the necessity for military training, what shall we say? To me, our duty is plain. [Applause.]

Mr. BENDER. Mr. Chairman, in speaking before I made mention of the chairman of the Committee on Military Affairs, a gentleman I hold in high esteem. I have watched his conduct here during the past 2 years and I respect his judgment and respect him as a Congressman. I believe he is absolutely sincere in this matter, but I disagree violently with his position in his conduct during these last 2 days on this measure. He referred to our having 4 hours of debate yesterday, and 1 hour on the rule. I was here during the entire session yesterday, and during my service here I have never known a more flagrant attempt at railroading.

The President of the United States put the figure at 50,000 planes for the Army, 15,000 planes for the Navy. A program appropriating an ultimate $14,000,000,000 has been established, and large sums have already been voted toward this total. The Army and Navy know full well exactly what they want. Last week not a single fighting plane had been ordered because of the mountain of rules and the endless red tape of official regulations.

At the present time, the United States Army has 2,700 planes, of which only a few are modern. The Navy has 1,800 effective fighters. But at the present rate of production, it will take years for the Nation's two fighting forces to reach the goals they have set for air defense. William S. Knudsen, head of the Defense Commission, in charge of military production, reported to the Nation that the present rate of airplane production is less than 1,000 per month. He predicted that it would take at least 2 years to raise this level to the 3,000 per month required by standards which we have established. During the month of August 1940, United States aviation factories are expected to turn out 895 planes, including commercial and training planes. Our own Army and Navy will receive 396 of these planes. To Great Britain 236 will be delivered. American commercial air lines have contracted for 174. Other foreign nations expect to receive 84, and 5 have not yet been classified.

In all this preparedness talk, not one contract has been let for bombing, observation, or pursuit planes, in spite of the fact that all details of the entire program have been rushed by the War and Navy Departments on a night-and-day working schedule. Manufacturers of airplanes insist that New Deal restrictions are a major cause of confusion and delay in getting the program under way.

Up to the present time, working-hour restrictions which are a definite part of the New Deal legislative set-up, have been maintained on a rigid basis. But working hours are not the sole factor in holding up production. In 1934 the Vinson-Trammel bill limited the profits of aviation and shipbuilding companies to a 10-percent figure, although no limit was placed on the profits of tank manufacturers, armored cars, rifle makers, or munitions plants. A few short weeks ago another New Deal measure further cut the maximum profit limit to 8 percent on the sale price in contracts for the manufacture of ships and planes. Under the Treasury regulations set up to carry this proposal into effect, a series of regulations was established, under which the costs of plant expansion, including the amortization of building expenses, and taxes were both excluded. To carry out the aviation and shipbuilding program of the Nation, more than $350,000,000 must be invested by existing companies. But no manufacturer is willing to invest sums comparable to this figure when his profits must be used for a 15-year period in paying for the expansion of his plants.

Nor is there any assurance that present orders would continue on a profitable basis for the next 15 years. The lessons of overexpansion taught by the World War in the period after 1918 have not been forgotten by manufacturers today. Because of this serious problem, aviation leaders are reluctant to enter into large and exclusive Government orders. Until this difficulty is overcome by some intelligent attempt to include amortization costs as part of the permissible figure for determining profits, we shall continue to mark time on the execution of contracts for the most important elements of our defense program.

Through the whole situation, there rises a pronounced political aroma. The administration at Washington is now considering the writing of plane contracts for delivery in 1945. If the amortization trouble is settled by new excess-profits legislation, the contracts could then be revised to call for faster delivery. Meanwhile, admittedly necessary production falls far behind because the New Deal refuses to acknowledge the possibility of error.

Mr. SCHAFER of Wisconsin. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BENDER. I yield.

Mr. SCHAFER of Wisconsin. We were also told by the press, the Capitol Parade, appearing in the Washington Evening Star of August 13, that they have made a great deal of progress with this national defense program; that Mr. "Chip" Robert, former secretary of the New Deal National Committee, has already received $1,000,000 in gravy under this national defense program. Does not the gentleman think we had better investigate the matter pretty soon and investigate this fixer?

Mr. BENDER. Let me add this in the closing time that I have: This Congress is in session today to prevent an emergency arising. We are here to keep the United States from being in an emergency. We do not want to do anything here to foment an emergency.

Mr. MARTIN of Iowa. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BENDER. I yield.

Mr. MARTIN of Iowa. In response to the comment made by the chairman of my committee, the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. MAY], and I have a great deal of respect for his opinion and ability as chairman of that committee and his views, but I am somewhat shocked at the view he expressed, that leaving the sending of the guard outside the continental limits of the United States up to the discretion of Congress would be such a national calamity.

Mr. THORKELSON. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BENDER. I yield.

Mr. THORKELSON. Will the gentleman please state what our attitude would be if Canada or Mexico passed a bill to train their armies in the United States?

Mr. BENDER. The gentleman answers his own question.

Mr. HINSHAW. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BENDER. I yield.

Mr. HINSHAW. Does not the gentleman think if we are going to send troops, Regulars, Reserves, or the National Guard, or otherwise into such countries as Mexico, Costa Rica, Uruguay, and Brazil for the purpose of protecting the Monroe Doctrine, that it should take action on the part of the Congress of the United States before those troops are sent to those countries?

Mr. BENDER. I certainly do. The question has been raised regarding Mexico drafting men between the ages of 18 and 45. We have an entirely different situation here than they have. As I undestand it, Mexico is a dictatorship. Ours is a democracy. Let us not create an emergency through any action we may take on this measure at this time. [Applause.]

[Here the gavel fell.]

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Texas [Mr. RAYBURN] is recognized.

Mr. RAYBURN. Mr. Chairman, if I were speaking exactly as I would want to speak on this amendment, I would adopt, first, the remarks of the gentleman from Texas [Mr. THOMASON] on yesterday and the remarks of the gentleman from New York [Mr. WADSWORTH] today. [Applause.] I would probably be able to say that about other remarks that have been made with reference to this bill, but those two I heard throughout.

It seems to me that the logic and the reasoning of those gentlemen as against this amendment is conclusive. Today we see on anything called a defense measure the first thing that approaches sharp division. I trust that this amendment, which I think is dangerous, which I think will cause us to be misunderstood, not only in the Western Hemisphere but throughout the length and breadth of the earth, will be so overwhelmingly defeated that we will have no more divisions on matters affecting national defense. [Applause.]

In the capitals of the countries controlled by the dictators what we do and what we say here is known almost as soon as it is done or said. We have appropriated billions of dollars to equip an army, billions for airplanes and battleships and tanks and all the things that would accouter an army. Are we going to have an army to use those instruments or not? Are we going to build up the National Guard under the law, when every man who joined the National Guard under his oath understood that he might be called into Federal service when the Commander in Chief thought it was necessary to preserve, protect, and defend the interests of this country? There is nothing in the Constitution, there is nothing in the law, because the law is clear, about the power of the Commander in Chief over the National Guard. I want to re-echo here the statement made by the gentleman from New York [Mr. WADSWORTH] this morning in defense of the patriotism, in defense of the reasoning, in defense of the desires of the National Guard of this country, that they do not want to be known as tin soldiers and not ready to fight when their time comes. [Applause.]

In recent days we have made some agreements and some commitments. We have resolved with the other countries of the Western Hemisphere that if they are attacked or if we are attacked our interests are mutual. Are we going to say within less than 2 weeks after the conclusion of those conversations and those agreements that we will not use the soldiers of the United States to carry out what we have agreed to? Now you talk about the Commander in Chief. It does not make any difference whether you love or hate President Roosevelt; not a particle. Any President of the United States, with Congress in session or not in session, whether you pass this bill or whether you do not pass this bill, if he is unpatriotic enough, if he is so reckless that he is willing to plunge the country into war, he can do it whether the Congress of the United States is in session or not.

I do trust that this amendment is overwhelmingly and decisively defeated. [Applause.]

[Here the gavel fell.]

The CHAIRMAN. All time has expired.

The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Connecticut.

The question was taken; and on a division (demanded by Mr. MILLER) there were—ayes 108, noes 159.

Mr. MILLER. Mr. Chairman, I ask for tellers.

Tellers were ordered, and the Chair appointed as tellers Mr. MAY and Mr. MASON.

The Committee again divided; and the tellers reported that there were—ayes 110, noes 210.

So the amendment was rejected.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Iowa [Mr. MARTIN] has pending at the desk an amendment which is similar to that which was just voted on. Does he desire to withdraw it?

Mr. MARTIN of Iowa. Mr. Chairman, my amendment is similar to that of the gentleman from Connecticut. I ask unanimous consent to withdraw the amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, it is so ordered.

There was no objection.

The Clerk read, as follows:

SEC. 2. All National Guard, Reserve, and retired personnel ordered into the active military service of the United States under the foregoing special authority, shall from the dates on which they are respectively required by such order to report for duty in such service, be subject to the respective laws and regulations relating to enlistments, reenlistments, employment, conduct, rights, and privileges, and discharge of such personnel in such service to the same extent in all particulars as if they had been ordered into such service under existing general statutory authorizations.

Mr. HINSHAW. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment.

The Clerk read, as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. HINSHAW: On page 2, line 16, strike out the period, insert a colon and the following: "Provided, That each person so ordered into such active military service shall be physically examined under such regulations as the President may prescribe, and unless declared to be physically fit such orders shall be rescinded in respect to such person."

Mr. HINSHAW. Mr. Chairman, I have offered this amendment. It may not be necessary. If it is not necessary, I shall withdraw it at the completion of my remarks.

Mr. Chairman, in my opinion it is a very important thing that all the members of the National Guard and the Reserves shall be adequately examined physically before they are inducted into the Federal service. I say this because I have had some experience in this connection, for in my district is located one of the very large veterans' facilities which largely handles tubercular patients. Had many of the men in this hospital been adequately physically examined before they went into the service of the United States, they possibly would not now be in the facility at San Fernando, Calif.

The Veterans' Administration has available a large organization, and I understand it may be intended to use this organization in the examination of enrollees in this service. They should all have a fluoroscopic examination of the chest, and they should be given other examinations before they are inducted into the military service.

If the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. MAY] can assure me that this examination will be given to all persons inducted into the Federal military service, I shall be pleased to withdraw my amendment.

Mr. MAY. The only assurance I can give the gentleman is to state that it is already the law; that they have always done it and will continue to, in my judgment.

Mr. HINSHAW. The gentleman from Kentucky knows that during the World War a great many men were taken into the Army with very inadequate physical examination.

Mr. VAN ZANDT. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HINSHAW. I yield.

Mr. VAN ZANDT. Did I understand the gentleman to say that the Veterans' Administration facilities were to be used to examine these enrollees?

Mr. HINSHAW. No. I meant to say that the Veterans' Administration facilities could be made available through proper arrangement and payment for the services for use in examining these transferees to the Federal military service.

Mr. DONDERO. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HINSHAW. I yield.

Mr. DONDERO. Would the gentleman be in favor of an amendment which would require the physical examination of a soldier upon his discharge and before he went back into civilian life?

Mr. HINSHAW. I think that is the general practice now; but I am, indeed, in favor of it.

Mr. FADDIS. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HINSHAW. I yield.

Mr. FADDIS. Is the gentleman aware that there is a great deal of noise being made throughout the country now demanding that the military authorities relax the physical requirements before enlisting volunteers?

Mr. HINSHAW. I have not heard that, but it may be true. I have heard that some men have been refused because they needed a little dental work done perhaps.

Mr. FADDIS. That is one of the cries that has gone up by those in favor of the volunteer system.

Mr. ANDREWS. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HINSHAW. I yield.

Mr. ANDREWS. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that the amendment may be again read so the Members may fully understand it.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman yield for that purpose?

Mr. HINSHAW. I yield for that purpose, Mr. Chairman.

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, the Clerk will again read the amendment.

There was no objection.

The Clerk again read the amendment.

Mr. ANDREWS. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield further?

Mr. HINSHAW. I yield.

Mr. ANDREWS. I suggest to the chairman of the committee that the amendment might well be accepted.

Mr. HINSHAW. I thank the gentleman from New York. Is the gentleman from Kentucky willing to accept the amendment?

Mr. MAY. It is just an enlargement of the statute now existing. It constitutes surplusage, because it is the law now. I do not see the necessity for it.

Mr. HINSHAW. There is some doubt as to the functioning of the law. I know that I am in doubt. I think it would be highly desirable to have this amendment in the bill. It might save the country a very great sum of money in the long run, and also save sorrow to a great many parents and children to be certain that the enrollees are physically fit before they are mustered into the Federal service.

Mr. MAY. It is also a part of the regulations in the War Department and they adhere to it strictly as a compliance with existing statutes. Mr. Chairman, I cannot agree to the amendment because it would simply muddle up the statutes.

Mr. HALLECK. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HINSHAW. I yield to the gentleman from Indiana.

Mr. HALLECK. Section 111 of the National Defense Act provides that the Congress can declare a national emergency and thereby bring about the calling out of the National Guard. If the National Guard is called out pursuant to that section of the statute, then the statute does provide for the giving of a physical examination. Whether or not the calling out of the guard as provided in this bill would invoke the other provisions of the statute in respect to physical examination might be something of a question.

Mr. HINSHAW. Mr. Chairman, if it can be established that this matter is going to be cared for under existing law, perhaps in the course of a conference between the House and Senate the amendment, if not needed, could be removed.

Mr. MAY. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HINSHAW. I yield to the gentleman from Kentucky.

Mr. MAY. Section 115 of the National Defense Act relating to physical examination reads:

Every officer and enlisted man of the National Guard who shall be called into the service of the United States as such shall be examined as to his physical fitness under such regulations as the President may prescribe without further commission or enlistment.

Mr. HINSHAW. I understand that, but I believe that is in case of war. I therefore ask that the amendment be agreed to.

[Here the gavel fell.]

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from California [Mr. HINSHAW].

The question was taken; and on a division (demanded by Mr. HINSHAW) there were—ayes 63, noes 117.

So the amendment was rejected.

Mr. DIRKSEN. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment, which I send to the Clerk's desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. DIRKSEN: Page 2, line 16, insert a new subsection (b): "Such persons called into active military service under this act shall in addition to any other pay provided by law be entitled to such allowance for dependents as may be prescribed by the President."

Mr. MAY. Will the gentleman yield for a suggestion?

Mr. DIRKSEN. I yield.

Mr. MAY. If the gentleman's amendment applies anywhere it would not apply to this section. I reserve a point of order against the amendment, and I shall not insist on it.

Mr. DIRKSEN. Mr. Chairman, on the day that the Commander in Chief of our forces puts into effect the provisions of this act, it means that men with families will lay down their tools in various places in the country and come to the call of the colors. It will mean that lawyers, doctors, and other professional men will respond. It means that men in every walk of life in this country will respond, both single and married, both encumbered with dependents and unencumbered. I am advised by the War Department this morning that no provision is made for dependents. Two suggestions I think will presently come on to deal with that situation. One is carried in the bill, which preserves the right of any man encumbered with dependents to prefer a request and receive a discharge from the service. The other will probably be a bill to protect the civil liberties of those who are enrolled in the service, but which does not go to the whole question of immediate bread and butter once the breadwinner leaves the family fireside to become a part of the armed forces.

Insofar as the present provision of the bill is concerned, I can readily see, and this is dictated by the experience of the World War, that there will be many men with families who will not submit a request to be discharged from the service because of the fear that there may be imputed to them motives of one kind or another that they are not necessarily courageous or patriotic, and I fancy we ought to recognize that human equation.

This amendment proposes nothing else than to repose in the hands of the President entirely the authority to provide for dependents if he sees fit. He may do so if he wants to. The amendment is not mandatory and will not compel him to do so. However, if the authority is necessary the President then by rule and regulation can make provision for the dependents of those who go into the service. It is no departure from the practice we have engaged in before. We gave the President this power under the C. C. C. Act. We have given the President equivalent powers with reference to pay schedules so far as the Works Progress Administration is concerned. So, conferring this authority is not new, and since no provision is made now for dependents under existing law, it occurs to me that the Congress can well adopt this amendment and make provision so that there will be a proper and rightful distinction between the lad who is single and wholly unencumbered and the man who may have two, three, or four children but who for one reason or another will fail to make a personal request for discharge from the service.

During the World War we had a provision suspending the operation of foreclosure laws, tax liens, and so forth, which was all well and good, and it should be done, but that does not pay the bills incurred by a soldier's family for the necessaries of life, so this bread-and-butter provision should be made for those who have dependents and who will not claim exemption and seek a discharge from the Army.

Mr. VAN ZANDT. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DIRKSEN. I yield to the gentleman from Pennsylvania.

Mr. VAN ZANDT. During the World War we had the Allotment Act likewise, where the soldier sent $15 home to his dependents and the Federal Government provided $15 likewise.

Mr. DIRKSEN. I am willing to trust this responsibility to the President of the United States. I hope the amendment will be adopted whereby provision can be made for dependents, if necessary.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Illinois.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. SMITH of Ohio. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. SMITH of Ohio: On page 2, line 16, after "authorization", strike out the period, insert a comma, and the following: "Provided, That unless and until Congress shall have provided revenue by taxation and shall have authorized and made appropriations therefor the provisions of this section and of this joint resolution shall remain inoperative."

Mr. MAY. Mr. Chairman, I reserve a point of order against the amendment.

Mr. SMITH of Ohio. Mr. Chairman, I believe this is a real test of our patriotism. We are voting here on a bill that will involve the expenditure of an unknown amount of money. The amount will be large in any event, but we are making no provision whatever for the payment of the bill that is being incurred here. If it is a responsibility of the Congress to provide this measure, I believe it is the responsibility of the Congress to provide the means to pay the cost. Who is going to deny this? We have voted all these billions of dollars for defense but have provided only a measly little $1,000,000,000 in taxes to pay the bill. It seems to me it certainly is as much our responsibility to provide the means to pay the cost as it is to provide for calling the National Guard for training and for service.

I believe if we want to meet our responsibility now in this hour we should step up and provide the means for paying this bill, and not leave the payment for our defense to our children and our grandchildren. [Applause.]

[Here the gavel fell.]

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Kentucky reserved a point of order against the amendment. Does the gentleman insist on his point of order?

Mr. MAY. Mr. Chairman, I make the point of order that the amendment is not germane.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Ohio wish to be heard on the point of order?

Mr. SMITH of Ohio. Mr. Chairman, I do not understand enough about the parliamentary procedure here to argue this point, but I do believe that we all have common sense enough to know that whether or not the point of order should be sustained we ought to provide the means to pay this bill.

Mr. SCHAFER of Wisconsin. Mr. Chairman, I should like to be heard briefly on the point of order.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will hear the gentleman from Wisconsin on the point of order.

Mr. SCHAFER of Wisconsin. Mr. Chairman, this bill provides for the strengthening of the common defense. In view of the fact that the real danger to our country is from within and is the threat of national bankruptcy, since our Federal Treasury is almost bankrupt, I believe the amendment offered by the gentleman from Ohio really provides for the national defense in a far more effective manner than the balance of the bill which it is proposed to be amended.

The CHAIRMAN. Without regard to the merits of the amendment, the Chair will state that from a parliamentary standpoint the amendment undertakes to bring in unrelated matters and makes the effectiveness of the joint resolution determine upon the happening of unrelated contingencies. The amendment would therefore be subject to the point of order, and the Chair sustains the point of order.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 3. (a) Any member of any Reserve component of the land or naval forces who is on active duty or who may be assigned to active duty, and any person so ordered into the active military service of the United States who, in the judgment of those in authority over him, satisfactorily completes the period of service required under this joint resolution shall be entitled to a certificate to that effect upon the completion of such period of service, which shall include a record of any special proficiency or merit attained.

(b) In the case of any such person who has left a position or by reason of being ordered into such active military service is required to leave a position, other than a temporary position, in the employ of any employer and who (1) receives such certificate of satisfactory service, (2) is still qualified to perform the duties of such position, and (3) makes application for reemployment within 40 days after he is relieved from such service—

(A) if such position was in the employ of the United States Government, its Territories or possessions, or the District of Columbia, such person shall be restored to such position or to a position of like status and pay;

(B) if such position was in the employ of a private employer, such employer shall restore such person to such position or to a position of like status and pay unless the employer's circumstances have so changed as to make it impossible or unreasonable to do so;

(C) if such position was in the employ of any State or political subdivision thereof it is hereby declared to be the sense of the Congress that such person should be restored to such position or to a position of like status and pay.

(c) Any person who is restored to a position in accordance with the provisions of paragraphs (A) or (B) of subsection (b) shall be so restored without loss of seniority, insurance participation or benefits, or other benefits, and such person shall not be discharged from such position without cause within 1 year after such restoration.

(d) The failure or refusal of any private employer to comply with the provisions of paragraph (B) of subsection (b) or with the provisions of subsection (c) shall be an unfair labor practice within the meaning of and for all the purposes of the National Labor Relations Act.

(e) In any case in which no remedy is available under the National Labor Relations Act to require compliance by any private employer with the provisions of this section, the district court of the United States for the district in which such employer maintains a place of business shall have power, upon the filing of a motion, petition, or other appropriate pleading by the person entitled to the benefits of such provisions, to specifically require such employer to comply with such provisions. The court shall order a speedy hearing in such case and shall advance it on the calendar.

(f) Any member of the National Guard may resign his status within 20 days after ordered into the active military service of the United States if at such time he has dependent upon him a wife or child or both, and has no means with which to support such dependent or dependents except the wages or salary he can earn.

With the following committee amendment:

The committee amendment was agreed to.

Mr. MAY. Mr. Chairman, I have a number of clarifying amendments that merely improve the text of the bill. They relate to section 3 and part of section 4. I ask unanimous consent that they be considered at this time.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Kentucky asks unanimous consent to offer at this point in the bill certain clarifying amendments, which the Clerk will report for the information of the Committee:

The Clerk read as follows:

On page 2, line 19, before the comma, insert "and who, in the judgment of those in authority over him, satisfactorily completes such active duty."

On page 2, line 23, before "shall", insert a comma.

On page 2, line 24, before "such", insert "such active duty or."

On page 3, beginning with "has" in line 1, strike out through "leave" in line 3 and insert in lieu thereof the following: ", in order to perform such active duty or such service, has left or leaves."

On page 3, lines 5 and 6, strike out "of satisfactory service."

On page 3, line 9, before "service", insert "active duty or."

On page 4, line 14, strike out "The" and insert in lieu thereof "In case any private employer fails or refuses to comply with the provisions of subsection (b), the."

On page 4, line 20, after "in", strike out "and" and insert "any."

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the present consideration of the amendments just read?

There was no objection.

The amendments were agreed to.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the remaining committee amendments.

The Clerk read as follows:

On page 3, in line 13, after "like", insert "seniority."

On page 3, in line 17, after "like", insert "seniority."

On page 3, in line 23, after "like", insert "seniority."

Mr. MAY. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that the committee amendments be modified by inserting in each amendment after the word "seniority" a comma.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Kentucky?

Mr. DONDERO. Mr. Chairman, reserving the right to object, on page 3, in subsection (C) of subsection (b) of section 3, it is provided "if such position was in the employ of any State or political subdivision thereof." Suppose that applies to an elective office and his term has expired and his successor has been elected to fill the position, does the gentleman mean by this section to disqualify the man who is holding the office when the veteran returns?

Mr. MAY. The bill would not apply to the man who was not in office at the time it was enacted.

Mr. DONDERO. But suppose the veteran is the village clerk of your home city and he is called into the service and subsequently his successor is elected at the next election and then the veteran returns. Will the man who has been elected be disqualified from holding the office any longer?

Mr. MAY. Undoubtedly the gentleman knows that neither the bill nor the Congress can do anything at all about elections held under State laws that come at a regular time as provided by the constitutions of the various States. The man who has been elected to the office in the absence of the other man would certainly have title to the office.

Mr. DONDERO. The reason I raised the question as to that subsection is because it applies to every political subdivision in the country.

Mr. FADDIS. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DONDERO. I yield.

Mr. FADDIS. This provision only sets forth that it is the sense of the Congress that they shall be restored to State offices. We have no jurisdiction over the State offices, whether they are elective or appointive. We can only signify that we would like to have this done as a matter of policy and it would apply to an elective office the same as any other office because we have no jurisdiction over either one.

Mr. DONDERO. An elective officer certainly could not vacate or yield the office.

Mr. FADDIS. That is true; and I will submit to the gentleman that that is as far as the Congress can go in asking the State to do it if the State can do so.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. MAY]?

There was no objection.

The committee amendments were agreed to.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the remaining committee amendments.

The Clerk read as follows:

On page 3, line 25, strike out all of line 25, and on page 4 strike out down to and including line 13 and insert "(c) The."

The committee amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

On page 4, in line 15, after the word "such", insert the word "private."

The committee amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

On page 4, strike out the paragraph beginning in line 22, down through line 2 on page 5 and insert:

"(d) Any member of any Reserve component of the Army of the United States who has any person or persons dependent solely upon him for support and who has no other means of support except the wages or salary he can earn shall be discharged upon his own request made within 20 days of the date of his entry into the active military service of the United States."

Mr. VORYS of Ohio. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment to the committee amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. VORYS of Ohio to the committee amendment: On page 5, line 4, after the words "United States", strike out the remainder of line 4, and all of lines 5 and 6, and in line 8, strike out the word "entry" and insert the words "being ordered", so that the paragraph will read:

"(d) Any member of any Reserve component of the Army of the United States shall be discharged upon his own request made within 20 days of the date of his being ordered into the active military service of the United States."

Mr. VORYS of Ohio. Mr. Chairman, substantially this same amendment lost in the other body by 11 votes. A similar amendment has been introduced by the committee. The committee amendment permits a guardsman to be discharged upon his own request solely upon grounds that he has dependents who are supported by his earnings. Under the proposed draft law exemptions and deferments are far more liberal. General Marshall has said that the calling of the guard will be carried out in the spirit of the draft law. Therefore we may expect the exemptions to be far more liberal than the sole exemption provided here in the committee amendment.

Mr. ANDREWS. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. VORYS of Ohio. I yield.

Mr. ANDREWS. Will the gentleman be good enough to tell me what type of officer he has in mind that might wish to be discharged from the service who would not legitimately be covered by the provision now under consideration?

Mr. VORYS of Ohio. An officer might come within one of the classes of deferment in the draft law. He might have financial responsibilities. He might feel that he was important to the national defense in his business, or there may be many other reasons which would constitute good ground for exemption.

The difference between the committee amendment and my amendment is this.

The committee amendment lets the Army decide whether a citizen soldier will be a Regular in peacetime or not. My amendment lets the citizen soldier decide, or the guardsman decide, whether he is to be a Regular in peacetime or not.

Mr. MAY rose.

Mr. VORYS of Ohio. I refuse to yield further until I am through with my statement.

The number involved will be very few if the Army has given us the true facts. General Williams says:

Ninety-eight percent of them, I would say, are anxious to get the training which they feel they should have in view of the present condition of world affairs.

General Reckord, of the National Guard Association, says:

The National Guard * * * has gone on record officially in favor of some such legislation as this.

According to the testimony of General Williams, about 3 percent of the guard should be eliminated because of dependency or some other good reasons. Apparently more are willing to go than the Army thinks it should take. One hundred and twenty-five Reserve officers are enough for an army of over 2,000,000 men; certainly enough of them will be willing to go without forcing any of them to go.

So we can get the men we need under this resolution without drafting them. The question is whether we are going to force a man who thought he was a peacetime reservist and a wartime soldier to become a peacetime Regular without his consent. Of course, an argument can be made that the Federal oath he took justifies changing the law. I voted, although reluctantly, for the amendment a few moments ago, which would make no distinction between the Regulars and the guardsmen, because it is apparent the Army is putting the guardsmen in among the Regulars. The practical question is, however, is a man going to be forced to be a Regular without his consent, when the Army does not need him.

Let us remember we are not talking about universal compulsory wartime conscription. We are talking about minority peacetime conscription. We are not saying, "I am so patriotic that I think that all should go." We are saying, "I am so patriotic that I think we should force the minority to go whether they want to or not." Let us also remember that we are not talking about training. The bill calls it active military service, and that means the possibility of fighting and getting killed without any congressional declaration of war. We sent our forces to Tripoli, to Mexico, to China, and to Nicaragua in peacetime, to fight and die, without a declaration of war.

Force is quicker, more convenient than persuasion. Drafting is easier for the Army than getting volunteers. Dictatorship works faster than democracy, but our faith is that the slower, harder way for the Government is best for the citizen, that until peril requires compulsory service for all in equal circumstances and ability, convenience should not require compulsory service for a minority. We can get a sufficient number of the guard without drafting them. Let us not use force on anyone yet, just for the sake of using it.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Ohio has expired.

Mr. FADDIS. Mr. Chairman, I rise in opposition to the amendment. Here is another attempt to differentiate between the National Guard and the Regular Army. As has been carefully explained to the Members of the Committee by the gentleman from New York [Mr. WADSWORTH], every attempt has been made since 1920 to weld the National Guard, the Organized Reserves, and the Officers' Reserve Corps, and the Regular Army into one United States Army. Those who enlist in the National Guard or the members of the Officers' Reserve Corps or the members of the Organized Reserves all take the same oath. They are all part of the Army. Provision has been made in this legislation to allow those who have dependents to get out. The men in there who do not have dependents and have gone along in peacetime accepting the pay that has been given them throughout the years have been a part of the National Guard. They are being counted upon today as part of the defense forces of this Nation. I submit to the Members of this Committee that this amendment should be defeated, as it is nothing more than another attempt to differentiate between the various components of the United States Army.

Mr. WADSWORTH. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FADDIS. Yes.

Mr. WADSWORTH. To put it briefly, could it not be said of the amendment that it would authorize the National Guard to disband itself.

Mr. FADDIS. That is exactly true.

Mr. VORYS of Ohio. But the gentleman will concede that the National Guard under the national-defense law, enlisted under the oath that requires peacetime service to their State, and they are a part of the State government as General Williams said, a wartime service to their country. Is not that true?

Mr. FADDIS. I concede nothing of the kind. When they enlisted in the National Guard they took an oath the same as the soldier in the Regular Army and expected to do any duty they were called upon to do. The gentleman is mistaken about the status of the National Guard.

Mr. VORYS of Ohio. Under the law as it stood at that time.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Pennsylvania has expired.

Mr. SCHAFER of Wisconsin. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word.

Mr. Chairman, in the 5 minutes which I have to support this amendment, I wish to read an editorial appearing in the Milwaukee Journal of August 8, 1940, entitled "Be Fair to the Guard."

The Milwaukee Journal is one of the largest daily newspapers in the mid-West, and in the past no newspaper has generally supported President Roosevelt and his New Deal more faithfully than the Milwaukee Journal.

This is what the Milwaukee Journal editorially says with reference to the subject matter of the pending amendment:

[From the Milwaukee Journal of August 8, 1940]

BE FAIR TO THE GUARD

In all fairness, enlisted members of the National Guard should be allowed an opportunity to resign if and when the guard is called into active service and incorporated into the Army.

The proposal is to change the status of the guard very materially. Guardsmen are to be absent from their homes continuously for a year. They will no longer be able to pursue their vocations. And if the long-time plans of Army officials are carried out, the guardsmen may be entering upon a military career of some years. For the idea is first to train them thoroughly and use them to train young men called under the compulsory-service plan.

This is over and beyond the conditions under which the guardsmen enlisted. They always knew that they could be called into the armed forces of the United States if war came. But they did not agree to give up their incomes, disrupt their businesses, in instances, and separate themselves entirely from their families in peacetime—in other words, to bear a greatly enlarged share of the burden of defense preparations in peacetime.

We are for the bill to put the guard into training. We believe that this is necessary as the next step in defense. But this country can do it fairly. It does not need to work injustice or hardship on any group of citizens. The amendment giving guardsmen their choice should have been incorporated into the bill when the Senate passed it. Since that was not done, the House should make the correction.

The situation that has developed is just one more indication of the maladjustments that come from the voluntary enlistment system, since you have to carry that system out on a hit or miss basis. These guardsmen already have given more than other classes of citizens. They have given of their time and are at least partially trained. The question of their home responsibilities was not considered—it was not a factor in their enlistment. Now, suddenly, the guardsmen are to be asked to do a great deal more and the problem of responsibilities does come up.

If we do be fair to them, giving them an opportunity to resign, and if large numbers of them avail themselves of the chance, then the problem of filling the vacancies will be to the foreground. What about that? Are we to let it be done in a haphazard way once more? If the enlistments do not come in, are we to go ahead with half a guard? Or are we to get into the guard men who do not have these responsibilities of homes?

It all comes back to the question that is at the very heart of the movement to create a compulsory selective plan. The way to train the manpower of this Nation, and do it fairly, is to have universal enrollment and then select men according to their responsibilities and place them according to their abilities. If they should go into the forces for active combat training, put them there. If they should be in the home-defense forces, assign them to these forces. If they fit better into behind-the-line service units, assign them to these places.

That is democratic, fair, and practical.

Mr. Chairman, this editorial published in the Milwaukee Journal, which, for the past 7 years, has generally supported President Roosevelt and his New Deal, contains sufficient reasons to justify the adoption of the pending amendment. I ask for your careful consideration of those reasons and your support of the pending motion. [Applause.]

[Here the gavel fell.]

Mr. HALLECK. Mr. Chairman, I rise in opposition to the pro forma amendment.

Mr. Chairman, since this matter has been under consideration I have tried to give some study and consideration to what might have been contemplated by a National Guard man when he enlisted in the guard. I sought some information on that proposition in the debate yesterday. Now, without regard to what can be done as a cold-blooded legal proposition, in my opinion there is an element of good faith that ought to be considered before we enact this legislation.

In the first place, the National Defense Act provides that the members of the National Guard shall not be in the active service of the United States except when ordered thereto in accordance with the law. Now, that means in accordance with the law in existence at the time they enlisted.

There has been a lot of talk about the oath that the National Guard men take. That oath reads in part in these words:

I, a citizen of the United States, hereby acknowledge to have voluntarily enlisted * * * under the conditions prescribed by law.

Now, what are the conditions prescribed by law for the calling into the national service of the United States men who enlisted in the National Guard? They are when the Congress shall have declared a national emergency and shall have authorized the use of armed land forces of the United States for any purpose requiring the use of troops in excess of those of the Regular Army. Those are the conditions upon which a member of the guard can be called into Federal service under existing law.

This act is not in compliance with that statute that existed when present guardsmen joined the guard.

Now, it has been said in debate, it was said yesterday, that this statute does not undertake to declare that emergency, but seeks to do the thing that would be done if an emergency were declared, which leads me to this inquiry: If we feel that the National Guard should be called out, then is it within the province of the United States Congress to avoid its responsibility to find that the conditions exist, contemplated and written into the law at the time these people enlisted in the guard, or shall we change the rules after they have enlisted, and call them into service.

Mr. ANDREWS. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HALLECK. I refuse to yield. I only have 5 minutes.

I would like to point out another distinction to you. The statute that existed at the time every present guardsman enlisted provided that he should be called into service if he were called out under this provision of the statute for the period of the emergency or the war. Where can you find in here anything to justify the arbitrary fixing of a year as the time for which he should be called out? I refer you to section 92 of the Defense Act, which provides for the training of the National Guard. Therein it is recognized that the guardsmen shall be trained 48 times a year, 15 days a year, in a camp in the field. That is what was contemplated.

I am moved to support this amendment because I know that many members of the guard enlisted in contemplation of that statute. They did not expect that they would be called into active service of the United States to supplement the Regular Army in peacetime.

The argument has been made that we are again trying to draw a distinction between the Regular Army and the National Guard. Those arguments apply to the comparative status of the guardsman and the Regular after they are in the service. Here we are called upon to determine what shall be the situation under which the guardsman is called out and, in effect, put into the Regular Army of the United States in peacetime for 1 year.

[Here the gavel fell.]

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. VORYS].

The question was taken; and on a division (demanded by Mr. VORYS of Ohio) there were ayes 68 and noes 122.

So the amendment was rejected.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report a committee amendment to the committee amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. MAY to the committee amendment: On page 5, line 3, after the word "of", strike out "any Reserve component" and insert "the National Guard and the Organized Reserves."

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

The committee amendment was agreed to.

Mr. VOORHIS of California. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word for the purpose of asking the chairman of the committee a question.

I do not find any provision in the bill which has to do with protecting National Guard men who have contracted debts. What is going to happen to his equities when he goes into service? Has the committee any plan to meet that problem?

Mr. MAY. Section 4 provides that all of the benefits accorded by the Civil Rights Act of March 8, 1918, are hereby extended to the National Guard. In addition to that, I may say to the gentleman from California, that when we found that even this might not be sufficient to protect in all cases, the War Department submitted to the committee, and the committee is holding hearings on it, a rather extended bill to enlarge the protection of the individual in such cases.

Mr. VOORHIS of California. What happens to a man who is buying a home, for example, who is called into service under these circumstances?

Mr. MAY. If he is buying a home, but it has not been paid for, under the Civil Rights Act the court will protect his interests while he is in the service, even to the extent that a tenant is protected from being ousted.

Mr. VOORHIS of California. And the gentleman can assure us that his committee is going to bring in legislation that will take care of this situation completely?

Mr. MAY. We have held part of the hearings but, due to pressure of business, we could not complete them. We intend to complete them as soon as we can.

By unanimous consent the pro forma amendment was withdrawn.

Mr. MILLER. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. MILLER: On page 2, after line 25, insert a new subsection as follows:

"(b) All persons called into service under the provisions of this act shall be given a statement showing any physical defect noted. Upon completing his service he shall again be given a physical examination. When discharged each person shall be given a medical certificate showing any injuries, illnesses, or disabilities suffered by him while in service."

Mr. MILLER. Mr. Chairman, I think the amendment is clear. I know there is not a Member of the House but who has had to deal with veterans' claims during the time he has served in the Congress. Many times a claimant has come in and said he was hospitalized on such and such a date at such and such a place but a search of The Adjutant General's records fails to show he received treatment at that time or in some cases at any time.

All this amendment does is to carry out the provisions of existing law that the man be given an examination, and if it is found he has any defect those defects are to be made known to the person and noted on the record. In other words if he is taken in with second-degree flatfoot he will know it, and if there is an aggravation of that condition as a result of service it will be a matter of record both with the Government and with the soldier.

The last half of the amendment provides that the man upon being mustered out of service shall receive a statement along with his discharge showing any dates he might have been hospitalized; disabilities for which he was treated, and so forth. The only difference between this amendment and present law is that the information is not only made a matter of record in The Adjutant General's office, but is also given to the soldier. Thus, if a few years later a claim arises, allegedly growing out of disability incurred in the performance of military duty, there will be duplicate records, and we shall not have a repetition of many of the conditions over which we have worried so long since the last war.

Mr. HINSHAW. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MILLER. I yield.

Mr. HINSHAW. I think the gentleman's amendment is a splendid one. It goes farther than the one I had in mind a few moments ago which was defeated. I think it is one thing that is very necessary in avoiding unnecessary expense as a result of the defense program.

Mr. VAN ZANDT. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MILLER. I yield.

Mr. VAN ZANDT. Had this plan been in effect during the World War we would not have thousands of World War veterans today trying to establish their claims through supporting affidavits from their buddies.

Mr. MILLER. The gentleman is correct. While the present law requires that a man's disabilities be noted when he is discharged, it does not appear in sufficient detail to prove the case.

Mr. MAY. Mr. Chairman, I rise in opposition to the amendment.

Mr. Chairman, this amendment is wholly unnecessary. The law now provides for exactly what the amendment intends, and this is admitted by the gentleman in his statement. In addition to that, every Member of this House who has had any experience—and all of us have—on matters of this kind knows that every disability a man has, not only goes in his medical record but also on his service certificate or discharge certificate.

Mr. VAN ZANDT. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MAY. I yield.

Mr. VAN ZANDT. I agree with the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. MAY] that the Army, Navy, and Marine Corps are all required at the present time to note on every discharge any disability, treatment, or hospitalization credited a man in the service, but one must recognize sometimes the responsible persons fail to show this information on the discharge given the man when his enlistment expires or he is released from the service. The amendment offered by the gentleman from Connecticut [Mr. MILLER] simply orders the Army, Navy, and Marine Corps furnish the person affected by the bill before us a certificate showing his physical condition at time of enlistment as well as discharge, also during his period in service.

Mr. MAY. It is always shown in the man's medical record that is kept in The Adjutant General's office. The only thing the Department has done in the past is to make a note of the disabilities and to refer to the man's medical record.

Undoubtedly whatever is shown by the examination is made of record, both when he is received and when he is discharged. The regulations adequately cover the situation.

Mr. MILLER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MAY. I yield to the gentleman from Connecticut.

Mr. MILLER. If the chairman of the Committee on Military Affairs will come to my office, I will show him a dozen cases where the soldier has claimed he was hospitalized and where later on he proved he was hospitalized, yet there was nothing of record.

Mr. MAY. There are thousands of claims in this country and if they were all allowed it would bankrupt the country.

[Here the gavel fell.]

Mrs. ROGERS of Massachusetts. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word.

Mr. Chairman, I do not suppose there is any Member of the House who has not handled literally thousands of veterans' claims. I also believe that scarcely a Member of the House would rise today and say that the War Department has always given complete information as to a man's injuries. I happen to know of the case of a man who lost both legs in the service of his country, yet the information that came from the War Department was that the man had not been injured at all. Of course, the information was in error, but, nevertheless, that was what the information was. I have gone back to the War Department and to the Adjutant General's office time and time again for records of disabled men. I have gone back in some cases several times and sometimes on the last request I have received the information. The Members ought to know that today the War Department has records that have never been assembled, which is one reason we do not receive full and complete information at times. Surely we cannot deny the veterans this information. Do the Members realize also that hours and hours of labor will be saved in going through files at the Navy and War Departments and thousands of dollars saved in work there and at the Veterans' Administration.

Mr. SCHAFER of Wisconsin. Will the gentlewoman yield?

Mrs. ROGERS of Massachusetts. I yield to the distinguished gentleman from Wisconsin, a veteran himself, who has done so much for the veterans.

Mr. SCHAFER of Wisconsin. I have a disabled veterans' home and hospital in my district and I have personally studied many thousands of their compensation cases.

Mrs. ROGERS of Massachusetts. I know the gentleman has. He has done fine work for them also.

Mr. SCHAFER of Wisconsin. The gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. MAY] stated that a veteran's medical record appears on his discharge. That is not a true statement of fact. In fact, some of these medical records take a whole page and more and there is not any blank sections on the discharge to include one-half of 1 percent of some of the medical records.

Mrs. ROGERS of Massachusetts. I realize that is true. It also does not include the clinical records and I would like to have the clinical report included.

Mr. VAN ZANDT. Will the gentlewoman yield?

Mrs. ROGERS of Massachusetts. I yield to the distinguished gentleman from Pennsylvania, a veteran who was national commander of the Veterans of Foreign Wars, a great authority on veterans' affairs, and a great fighter in their behalf.

Mr. VAN ZANDT. Is it not true that since the guard may be ordered into South America and something may happen, the troops may be 100 or 200 miles away from the headquarters company where the record is located, a man up in the front lines may be disabled in some way and no information brought back to the headquarters company and noted on his record?

Mrs. ROGERS of Massachusetts. That is true. Also men may develop tropical fever. Often a record of these tropical fevers has not been made. Many men today should receive compensation but cannot get it because their medical records are not complete. I know everyone who has gone into the matter admits that that is true. I hope the pending amendment will be agreed to.

Mr. FADDIS. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last two words.

Mr. Chairman, may I say to the members of the committee that this amendment is entirely superfluous. When a man receives an injury in the service at the present time—and this was true during the World War—it is made a matter of record on the morning report of that company, it is made a matter of record on the hospital report of the hospital he is sent to, and when he is discharged it is made a matter of record on his service record and also a matter of record on his discharge. If it is a wound received in action, he receives a wound certificate.

This is simply putting on to the Army more paper work, more red tape, to be confusing. May I leave a further thought with you. If a man loses this record or if it has disappeared, then there would be prejudice created against him because he did not have it when he went to have his claim adjusted. The intention of the gentleman from Connecticut is undoubtedly good, but it would simply result in confusing the issue and increasing the red tape and paper work necessary in the administration of the Army.

Mr. HEALEY. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FADDIS. I yield to the gentleman from Massachusetts.

Mr. HEALEY. Can the gentleman see any good and valid reason why a detailed report should not be kept, although it involves a little extra paper work?

Mr. FADDIS. As I said, it is already kept in the Army at the present time.

Mr. MILLER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FADDIS. I yield to the gentleman from Connecticut.

Mr. MILLER. Would the gentleman be surprised if I could show him correspondence from the Veterans' Administration, where they spent 3 months trying to convince me I was in an infantry outfit when I never saw an infantry outfit at all?

Mr. FADDIS. I do not know anything about that, but there probably was a confusion of names which this amendment would not eliminate.

Mr. VAN ZANDT. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FADDIS. I yield to the gentleman from Pennsylvania.

Mr. VAN ZANDT. The gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. FADDIS] served overseas with a lot of distinction and knows better than anyone in this House that the records of hundreds of men were destroyed by shell fire, and new records were developed containing practically no information as to a man's physical condition or his service in the lines.

Mr. FADDIS. Then how could they make out the record which the amendment of the gentleman from Connecticut provides for?

Mr. VAN ZANDT. I just mentioned that.

Mr. FADDIS. If records were destroyed, but were duplicated afterward.

Mr. FITZPATRICK. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FADDIS. I yield to the gentleman from New York.

Mr. FITZPATRICK. I had a case where a man was injured. His leg was fractured. He was in the Navy, but the record was destroyed, and no recognition could be had of him, and he could not prove it.

Mr. FADDIS. If the man was wounded, he would have had a wound certificate. I am sure that records are not destroyed purposely, but accidents do occur, and a man might lose his own certificate. I hope the amendment will fail.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Connecticut [Mr. MILLER].

The question was taken; and on a division (demanded by Mr. MAY) there were—ayes 98, noes 64.

Mr. FADDIS. Mr. Chairman, I demand tellers.

Tellers were refused.

So the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. KEOGH. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. KEOGH: On page 3, line 14, after "pay", insert the following: "and shall be entitled to receive his regular compensation for the period of any accrued annual leave to which he is or may be entitled, such leave to be computed from the day he is ordered into such active military service, the provisions of the acts of May 10, 1916, and August 29, 1916 (title 5, sec. 58, U. S. C.) to the contrary notwithstanding."

Mr. TABER. Mr. Chairman, I make the point of order that the amendment is not germane to the subject matter of the section involved.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman desire to be heard on the point of order? The section deals with benefits and compensation.

Mr. TABER. Mr. Chairman, the amendment provides an additional and different method of paying the members of the Reserve and sets up something entirely different from what has been provided. The section provides for reemployment and the amendment provides for compensation and for credit in connection with retirement and sick leave. They are entirely different.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair is constrained to hold that section 3 is practically entirely devoted to the benefits and compensation which these men who are called into the service shall receive. It would appear to the Chair that the amendment offered by the gentleman from New York is certainly in line with that. Therefore the Chair overrules the point of order.

Mr. KEOGH. Mr. Chairman, I believe we will all agree that the Committee on Military Affairs has done an excellent job in attempting to afford to those National Guardsmen or Organized Reservists who are or may be called into active service as high a degree of job protection as can be afforded them under the provisions of this bill.

In that connection I believe I should state to this Committee, and I am proud to say that the mayor of the city of New York and the Governor of the State of New York have both announced that with respect to those civil employees of the city and State who may be called into active service the city and State will pay to them the difference between their present regular compensation and the pay they may receive in active service. They will suffer no reduction in income.

The purpose of my amendment is to suspend the prohibition on the payment of dual salaries imposed by section 58 of title 5 of the United States Code, so as to permit the payment to those employees of the Federal Government who may be called into active service under the provisions of this bill the compensation they would have received for the period of any accrued leave to which they might have been entitled on the day they were called into service. I believe you will all agree with me that the economic readjustments that will necessarily follow from the enactment of this law and the calling into active service of any citizens of the country will be great. I believe that in connection with the employees of the Federal Government who have not had an opportunity to take advantage of their annual leave because of the pressure of business we should on our part lead the way for the political subdivisions of the country as well as private employers in affording those citizens the maximum degree of job protection and economic security we can give to them.

I trust the amendment will be adopted.

Mr. HINSHAW. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. KEOGH. I yield to the gentleman from California.

Mr. HINSHAW. Do I correctly understand the gentleman to say that this would compensate a man for the accumulated leave he has now, if he is ordered directly into the service without being given an opportunity to use it?

Mr. KEOGH. Exactly.

Mr. HINSHAW. May I say to the gentleman that of my own knowledge I know of a case in which a man has over 2 months' accumulated leave, and he has been ordered directly into the service for a year of active duty without being able to take any of the accumulated leave due him. I therefore support the gentleman's amendment.

Mr. KEOGH. I thank the gentleman very much. [Applause.]

Mr. MAY. Mr. Chairman, I rise in opposition to the amendment.

Mr. Chairman, I merely wish to say that this is a very far-reaching matter. It has had no consideration by the committee and was not brought to the attention of the committee. It may involve $25,000,000 of expense for the Government, it may involve $50,000,000, or $100,000,000, or any other number of millions of dollars. A matter of this concern ought not to be written into legislation on the floor of the House without adequate consideration by the committee. I hope the Committee of the Whole, notwithstanding the statement of the gentleman from New York, will vote down the amendment. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from New York [Mr. KEOGH].

The amendment was rejected.

Mr. COLE of Maryland. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. COLE of Maryland: On page 4, line 21, after the period insert a new sentence as follows: "Upon application to the United States District Attorney for the district in which such private employer maintains a place of business, by any person claiming to be entitled to the benefits of such provision, such United States District Attorney, if reasonably satisfied that such person so applying is entitled to the benefits of such provision, shall appear and act as attorney for such person in the amicable adjustment of the claim or in the filing of any motion, petition, or other appropriate pleading and the prosecution thereof to specifically require such employer to comply with such provision."

Mr. COLE of Maryland. Mr. Chairman, this amendment speaks for itself and I hope the committee will accept it. Yesterday while the distinguished chairman of the Military Affairs Committee the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. MAY], was presenting in his usual able and clear manner the opening statement in support of this important bill, I asked him from the floor of the House why some provision such as my amendment now includes was not found in the bill. The colloquy between the gentleman from Kentucky and me is found in the RECORD and I will not restate it here except to state briefly why I am offering the amendment. In section 3 (a) (B), on page 3, line 15, of the bill, is found this language:

If such position was in the employ of a private employer, such employer shall restore such person to such position or to a position of like seniority status and pay unless the employer's circumstances have so changed as to make it impossible or unreasonable to do so.

After reading this language one naturally wonders when in the case of a returning soldier he is met with his former employer refusing his old job because he finds it impossible and unreasonable to do so, how the soldier's rights can then be enforced, assuming that he has just and reasonable claim and that the employer is not playing fair but taking an easy advantage of him. There were thousands of cases of this character during the World War and we must, if possible, assure through proper legislation, every safeguard against a repetition of such conduct in the future.

The committee has in a way provided relief in section (C), line 14, page 4, of the bill wherein this provision is found:

The district court of the United States for the district in which such private employer maintains a place of business shall have power, upon the filing of a motion, petition, or other appropriate pleading by the person entitled to the benefits of such provisions, to specifically require such employer to comply with such provisions. The court shall order a speedy hearing in any such case and shall advance it on the calendar.

This language is inserted in lieu of the provisions in the original resolution as it passed the Senate wherein it was provided that the failure or refusal of any private employer to comply with the provisions of the bill pertaining to the future employment of a soldier was declared to be an unfair labor practice within the meaning of, and for all the purposes of, the National Labor Relations Act. As the bill passed the Senate with the provisions pertaining to the National Labor Relations Act therein, a soldier would in case of failure of private employer to comply with the provisions of the law have the services of a Government agency in support of his claim and the prosecution thereof. With this language stricken from the bill and section (C) inserted in lieu thereof, with which change I agree, this will be the situation:

Assume I am a soldier employed by company A, a large employer of men. After my year's service I return and employer A states to me that my position is not available because his circumstances have so changed that it is impossible or unreasonable for him to do so. Employer A has many able lawyers retained and it is but a mere detail for another case to be given them by him. As a soldier, I go to my attorney and ask him to prosecute my case under the provisions of section C. This is no easy job. The constitutionality of the provisions might be immediately involved, and my attorney would very properly ask for an adequate retainer, which I cannot pay. I am unable therefore to prosecute what might very well be a just and reasonable claim against an employer who is taking an unfair advantage of the opportunity presented in this bill.

I am not arguing now as to the constitutionality of any of these provisions, because we all realize that such is not free from doubt, but if it is constitutional to do what is now provided in the bill, it is certainly constitutional to add thereto the additional service which my amendment calls for. It merely states that if in the opinion of our United States District Attorney, after investigation, that the private employer has no real justification for refusing employment to the returning soldier that then the United States district attorney shall prosecute an action on behalf of the former soldier. The United States district attorney has the right, under my amendment, to adjust amicably such claims coming to his office. Altogether I think this is a very important and advisable amendment. If this part of the law is to be attacked as to its constitutionality, it would be in a case very likely growing out of these provisions which I have discussed and in that case I think in all fairness to the soldier the Government through its Department of Justice should be in charge of the prosecution and in sympathy with the factual basis for the case so presented. Then, too, the average employer, when he knows that the claim by a former soldier employee has been considered by the office of the United States district attorney will be most reluctant to fight through the courts in the open and before the public, a case such as would be presented unless he has a most convincing defense thereto.

Mr. MAY. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. COLE of Maryland. I yield to the gentleman from Kentucky.

Mr. MAY. In view of the statement I made yesterday in answer to a question of the gentleman from Maryland, and which appears in the RECORD, that we had some doubt about whether or not we had protected the rights of these enrollees when they returned as far as the district courts were concerned, I would be happy to agree to the amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Maryland.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. BURDICK. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment.

The clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. BURDICK: On page 5, line 9, after the period, insert: "Proceedings in foreclosure, attachment, or execution shall not be commenced or consummated by the Government of the United States or any agency thereof, or upon any indebtedness guaranteed in whole or in part by the Government against any member of the National Guard during his term of service, and not until the expiration of 1 year after his discharge."

Mr. BURDICK. Mr. Chairman, I do not think I need to argue that this is something that should be done because of the experience we had in the Civil War and in the Spanish-American War and in the last war. While these men are in the service, it is not asking too much of the creditors to defer action on their claims until these men get home and get a chance to protect themselves.

Mr. FADDIS. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BURDICK. I yield.

Mr. FADDIS. That matter is already covered in the Soldiers and Sailors Civil Rights Act, approved in 1918, and the committee is now engaged in drafting legislation that will cover matters of that kind in connection with all branches of the service.

Mr. BURDICK. This will not injure the bill.

Mr. FADDIS. No.

Mr. BURDICK. Then why do you object to it?

Mr. FADDIS. We are drafting general legislation that will cover the whole matter.

Mr. BURDICK. I am not depending on anybody in the future. We are doing this thing now.

Mr. BROOKS. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BURDICK. I yield.

Mr. BROOKS. The gentleman has asked whether or not this will injure the bill. It will injure the bill because it will write the same thing that is already in the law. You will simply have a duplication in the next section of almost the identical thing you are now advocating.

Mr. BURDICK. I do not think there is anything of that kind in the bill.

Mr. HARNESS. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BURDICK. I yield.

Mr. HARNESS. On page 5, section 4, the gentleman will find the language that the benefits of the Soldiers and Sailors Civil Relief Act, approved March 8, 1918, are included in this bill and extended to all National Guard, Reserve, and retired personnel, and even that act is now under consideration by the committee with the idea of broadening its provisions.

Mr. VOORHIS of California. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BURDICK. I yield.

Mr. VOORHIS of California. I would like to be corrected if I am mistaken, but as I understand it, the present law provides that if a man has indebtedness and is called into service, his payments are suspended for 1 year, but in the year following he must make up for the payments which have not been made in that year of service. In other words he must make 2 years' payments in 1.

Mr. FADDIS. The gentleman is mistaken. They are suspended until a certain time after he is discharged—60 days.

Mr. VOORHIS of California. It seems to me payments should be suspended during that year and he should take it up after that time right where it was when he entered the service.

Mr. FADDIS. They are suspended for 60 days after he is discharged from the service—he may be in the service 4 or 5 years.

Mr. VOORHIS of California. The matter is suspended and then he starts on his payments just as it was before?

Mr. FADDIS. Yes.

Mr. VOORHIS of California. He does not have to make additional payments during the first year after he leaves the service?

Mr. FADDIS. No.

Mr. VOORHIS of California. I was informed that he did.

Mr. BURDICK. Just wait a minute, because I want to talk a little myself.

Mr. Chairman, let me ask this question of the chairman of the committee. Is the gentleman willing to state to this Congress that under the act now being passed at this time that every member of the National Guard will receive the protection which is contained in my amendment?

Mr. MAY. I will just read to the gentleman the beginning of section 4 of this act:

The benefits of the Soldiers and Sailors Civil Relief Act, approved March 8, 1918, are hereby extended to all National Guard, Reserve, and retired personnel ordered into the active military service under authority of this joint resolution—and then, in addition to that, as has been repeatedly stated here, the War Department desires to enlarge those rights and further protect them and has requested our committee to give consideration to such a measure which I have introduced and is now pending.

Mr. BURDICK. The gentleman's answer is, then, that they will be protected.

Mr. MAY. They will be; yes.

Mr. BURDICK. Then I ask unanimous consent, Mr. Chairman, to withdraw my amendment.

Mr. CASE of South Dakota. Mr. Chairman, reserving the right to object, I would like to know if the act of March 1918 is broad enough to cover the types of obligation that may have been incurred under feed and seed loans and things of that type that we have provided for in recent years. We have gone into the matter of lending money to farmers and people are getting a type of loan that was not provided in 1918.

Mr. BROOKS. Undoubtedly this would cover seed loans.

Mr. O'TOOLE. Then, I have no objection.

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection the amendment will be withdrawn.

There was no objection.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from New York [Mr. O'TOOLE] offers an amedment which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. O'TOOLE: Page 3, line 14, strike out the semicolon and insert "immediately upon request of such person."

Mr. O'TOOLE. Mr. Chairman, while the authors of this joint resolution have gone to much trouble in laying out the procedure that the discharged citizen soldier will use to bring about restoration of his former position, they do not place any obligation upon the former employer as to when he shall take this employee back. It is possible under this resolution as it is drawn today for this employer to procrastinate for a great length of time, although there is an obligation on the part of the discharged soldier to make such application within 40 days. In order not to work a hardship on this man who is discharged and who has made a sacrifice in giving his services, I think that my amendment which calls for immediate restoration at the request within the statutory period should be agreed to, rather than a period that is absolutely indefinite.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from New York.

The question was taken; and on a division (demanded by Mr. O'TOOLE) there were—ayes 13, noes 55.

So the amendment was rejected.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from New York [Mr. O'TOOLE] offers another amendment which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. O'TOOLE: Page 3, line 16, after the word "shall", insert "immediately."

Mr. O'TOOLE. Mr. Chairman, this is the same amendment, except that it affects a private employer. There is no sense in putting the provision in the resolution about reemployment unless you put a statutory penalty on the employer. You know very well it is possible for him to say that he is going to do it in 2 months, 5 months, or whenever he gets the opportunity. He alone sets the time of restoring the man. It is not set by statute. You are working a grave injustice on those who will return from the service, in most instances broke, and who will need their positions and who cannot afford to wait long periods for the Federal courts to act.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from New York.

The amendment was rejected.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from New York [Mr. O'TOOLE] offers another amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. O'TOOLE: Page 3, line 19, strike out the semicolon and insert "for a period of 6 months."

Mr. O'TOOLE. Mr. Chairman, while this joint resolution calls for reemployment of the discharged soldier, there is nothing in the resolution itself that would prevent an employer from reemploying a man for 1 day or 1 week and then dismissing him and saying that he had complied with the law. It is true that the man can go to the Federal courts, but the courts in the various districts will give different decisions, some saying that 1 day is a sufficient compliance, some saying 2 weeks, and some 1 week, and we will have a different law in every section of the country. To avoid this, and to make up for the sacrifice these men have made and to penalize those employers who would like to disobey the law, I think we should make it compulsory with the employer to take these men back for a period of 6 months, and if they are taken back for 6 months, in 99 cases out of 100 they will be there for good.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from New York.

The amendment was rejected.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from New York [Mr. O'TOOLE] offers another amendment.

Mr. O'TOOLE. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to withdraw that amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, the amendment will be withdrawn.

There was no objection.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. DIRKSEN] offers an amendment which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. DIRKSEN: Page 5, after line 9, insert the following:

"(e) Any person called into active military service under this act who is unable to find employment within 30 days after honorable dismissal from the active Federal military service shall, upon certification by a State employment office that such person, after diligent effort was unable to find employment (of a nature comparable to that in which such person was employed prior to the time such person was so called into active military service, if employed at that time), be entitled to receive compensation at the rate such person was receiving at the time of dismissal from active Federal military service, for such period as such person remains unemployed, but not for a period in excess of 6 months."

Mr. MAY. Mr. Chairman, I reserve a point of order against the amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Illinois is recognized for 5 minutes.

Mr. DIRKSEN. Mr. Chairman, the pending amendment provides that after one inducted into service under this act has finished his 12 months' service, goes back home, makes a diligent effort to find a job, then receives certification from a State employment agency that he cannot find a job, he shall be entitled to continue to receive pay for a period not to exceed 6 months after his service has been discontinued in the Army.

There is a beautiful editorial in the New York Herald this morning. Oddly enough, despite defense expenditures, despite the fact that shipyards, arsenals, armories, and factories are all engaged on defense production, the W. P. A. rolls have gone up from the 1st to 31st of July 1940. Make no mistake, there will be W. P. A. when the boys come back in uniform if we continue present domestic policies. They will look for a job. Those jobs will certainly not be abundant. I remember landing home in September of 1919 and the first thing that struck my eye was the men in uniform for whom there were no jobs. They went away to the blare of brass bands. Usually, when they were around town for a while somebody said, "Why don't those boys go to work?" That was back in the lush days of this country when there was no forty-two, forty-five, or forty-nine billion dollar debt and when there were no 10,000,000 on the unemployed rolls of the Nation.

When they come back after a year there will be insufficient jobs, despite the best of intentions. Then there remains for them what? The W. P. A. Why not continue to pay them for a period not to exceed 6 months so that they can readjust themselves to civilian life when they come back? If a State employment agency certifies that there is no job, that they have made a diligent effort to find a job, then we ought to preserve the innate respect and integrity of those who have served their country and keep them on for a period not to exceed 6 months.

Mr. VAN ZANDT. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DIRKSEN. I yield.

Mr. VAN ZANDT. Your amendment is right along the line of the $60 that a soldier received when he received his discharge? The $60 was to provide himself with clothes and pave the way for a job?

Mr. DIRKSEN. We can save money under an amendment of this kind. Let us assume there were 100,000 who had to go on W. P. A. Under the lowest scale it would be $44 a month. It would run around twenty-six or twenty-seven million dollars for a period of 6 months, which is the maximum. If you keep them on at soldiers' pay for a period of 6 months, there would be a saving to the Government, as a matter of fact, and it would not be necessary for a man in uniform, after serving 12 months, to go into a relief office and get certification so that he can keep body and soul together and take care of his family.

Mr. EBERHARTER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DIRKSEN. I yield.

Mr. EBERHARTER. Will you not be doing an injustice to those ex-service men, because if they are getting this $30 a month they will not be eligible for W. P. A. at the higher rate?

Mr. DIRKSEN. They still have a choice. They have the choice of not having to break the bitter bread of charity, having worn the uniforms for 12 months. That is the difference. I think it is very essential because if the relief rolls are expanding now, with millions upon millions being fed into the productive enterprises of the country, certainly there will be relief rolls. Certainly there will be unemployment. Certainly there will be W. P. A. when they come back home. Shall they break that bread, or shall we permit them, on the basis of a certificate that a job is not there when they return, to be kept on the rolls not to exceed 6 months?

Mr. MAY. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DIRKSEN. I yield.

Mr. MAY. Has the gentleman obtained any figures from the Army or the Treasury or any other department of the Government as to the additional cost of his amendment?

Mr. DIRKSEN. Why, the arithmetic is self-manifest. Let us assume there will be 100,000——

Mr. MAY. Well, assume there will be a million brought in, if you are going to assume.

Mr. DIRKSEN. All right. Then we are still taking care of them if the provisions of this bill relating to going back to Government, State, or private employment do not work out. You cannot be sure that they will be absorbed when they come back. Some provision must be made for them. There is not a soldier in this House today who does not recognize what happened when the boys came back from Europe and when there were no jobs and there were no brass bands. [Applause.]

[Here the gavel fell.]

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. DIRKSEN].

The question was taken; and on a division (demanded by Mr. DIRKSEN) there were—ayes 58, noes 89.

So the amendment was rejected.

Mr. MAY. Mr. Chairman, a parliamentary inquiry.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. MAY. Are there any more amendments pending at the desk to section 3?

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair is not advised of any further amendments to section 3.

Mr. MAY. Then I ask that we proceed to section 4.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 4. (a) The benefits of the Soldiers and Sailors Civil Relief Act, approved March 8, 1918, are hereby extended to all National Guard, Reserve, and retired personnel ordered into the active military service under authority of this joint resolution, so long as such personnel are in such service and for 60 days thereafter, and except as hereinafter provided the provisions of such act shall be effective for such purposes.

(b) For the purposes of this section—

(1) The following provisions of such act of March 8, 1918, shall be inoperative: Section 100; and paragraphs (1), (2), and (5) of section 101; article 4; article 5; paragraph (2) of section 601; and section 603.

(2) The term "persons in military service," when used in such act, shall be deemed to mean persons ordered into the active military service under the authority of this joint resolution.

(3) The term "period of military service," when used in such act, when applicable with respect to any person, shall be deemed to mean the period beginning with the date on which such person is ordered into such active military service and ending with the date on which he is relieved from such service.

Mr. LUTHER A. JOHNSON. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word.

Mr. Chairman, I shall not detain the House by making a speech. I sought recognition at this time simply for the purpose of reading a telegram which I have just received from Maj. Gen. Claude V. Birkhead, the commanding general of the Texas National Guard. His home is in San Antonio, Tex. He is not a professional soldier. He is a very distinguished lawyer of that State and is the commanding general of the National Guard. He had a splendid military record during the World War. This telegram was addressed to me as chairman of the Texas delegation in the House, and I read it as reflecting the sentiment of the officers and members of the National Guard in Texas. I am sure it reflects the sentiment elsewhere as well. It reads as follows:

TEXAS DELEGATION,
House of Representatives.
% LUTHER JOHNSON, Chairman, House Office Building, Washington, D. C.

Possibility exists that history repeats and Congress fiddles while America burns. No American is willing to take the remotest chance on American liberty and independence. Everyone I contact here feels that quick and favorable action on National Guard and selective service bills essential step toward our national safety. Believe all Texas feels thusly, and will approve active support quick passage, and mobilization.

CLAUDE V. BIRKHEAD.

Mr. Chairman, I yield back the balance of my time.

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, the pro forma amendment will be withdrawn.

There was no objection.

Mr. BROOKS. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word.

Mr. Chairman, with the fury of the German-Italian invasion of England increasing hourly, I tell you that this bill is extremely important to the preservation of the United States. The last great democracy of the Old World has its back to the wall, fighting for its very existence today. What the result of this gigantic battle going on now may be no one at present knows; but everyone knows that events are transpiring today which may change the course of history for 1,000 years.

In this situation I am not interested in technicalities. I am interested, Mr. Chairman, in the fundamental principle that this Nation must be prepared to preserve its very existence, and this cannot be assured without giving our people a reasonably large and well-trained Army. I served in the last war and had occasion to see how troops without training behave under war conditions. It is a terrible thing to send young men to arms in any event, but it is a tragic thing to send them to arms without adequate training to protect themselves and be given a reasonable chance of saving that life which the Almighty gave to them.

The terms of this bill permit the President to call out for training purposes any or all of the National Guard men throughout the United States. This includes some 242,000 National Guard men, and the training will be extended through a period of 12 months. We who serve on the Military Affairs Committee feel that training of this body of men at the present time is vitally necessary to the welfare of the Nation. We hope by this action, and other action already taken and that to be taken at a later date, the Nation will be spared the tragedy of what has already befallen 10 nations of the Old World during the last 12 months. We fervently hope that by the enactment of this measure this Nation will be guaranteed its own integrity and destiny.

This Congress has already voted billions of dollars for the purchase of machinery, equipment, guns, tanks, airplanes, and all other kinds and character of equipment necessary to properly provide for an army in excess of a million men. The very fact that all of this money is necessary for the purchase of material indicates in itself Congress knows this country faces a crisis. The very fact that much of this equipment is expensive and complicated indicates beyond the necessity of argument that the men who use this equipment must be well trained. Airplanes, guns, tanks, range finders, searchlights, and other army equipment is useless without the trained men to back them up and put them to service. This bill gives the Nation for training purposes some of the men so badly needed by the Republic.

It is expected by the War Department that all of the National Guard will be called out into active service by January 1, 1941. Of course, this is going to create a hardship upon many of these men who have joined this branch of the service not expecting this emergency. Congress must certainly regret this fact; but in the course of our lives there are some things which call for sacrifices and for hardships. If our liberties and our institutions are worth preserving, our people must be prepared to render their full share of patriotic service. The officers and men of the National Guard have volunteered to serve, and in this respect they constitute a volunteer force. I know the men of the National Guard and I know them to be loyal and patriotic. I know that they are prepared to perform their duty to the service, as I believe all red-blooded American boys are likewise prepared when the hour strikes, which God grant may never happen.

Mr. Chairman, I am in favor of this bill because it calls into active training service the only organized reserve army which the Nation has to call. I favor it because it calls to the colors in this emergency an alert, active group of men who are ready and willing to serve. I believe, if submitted to an actual vote, the National Guard of America would voluntarily respond almost 100 percent. [Applause.]

By unanimous consent, the pro forma amendment was withdrawn.

The CHAIRMAN. There is pending at the desk an amendment offered by the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. MAAS], which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. MAAS: Page 6, line 2, change the period to a comma and add the words: "and retired Reserve personnel of the Navy, Marine Corps, and Coast Guard who have been or who may hereafter be ordered into active duty."

Mr. MAY. Mr. Chairman, that is an amendment that I offered for the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. MAAS]. The committee has no objection to it, and I ask that it be adopted.

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, the amendment will be agreed to.

There was no objection.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 5. All laws and parts of laws in conflict herewith are hereby suspended to the extent that they may be in conflict with any provision hereof.

Mr. RICH. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. RICH: Page 6, line 11, after the word "hereof", strike out the period, insert a colon and add the following: "Provided, That this resolution shall not be construed as granting to the President any additional powers not herein specifically granted."

Mr. RICH. Mr. Chairman, on yesterday the chairman of the committee made the statement that by passing this legislation Congress declares an emergency. The gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. FADDIS] also said that Congress has made these appropriations, thus giving notice that there is an emergency; and I quote also from George C. Marshall, Chief of Staff of the United States Army, who testified before the committee:

In the present situation we could not even proceed on an emergency basis because we cannot presume an action of Congress.

Let me call your attention to the fact that if an emergency does not exist but by the passing of this bill Congress creates an emergency and that is the word to the world then the Members of Congress are themselves responsible for granting to the President the power to do that. Let me call your attention to Public Law No. 416 of the Seventy-third Congress. I read from section 606:

(c) Upon proclamation by the President that there exists war or a threat of war or a state of public peril or disaster or other national emergency, or in order to preserve the neutrality of the United States, the President may suspend or amend, for such time as he may see fit, the rules and regulations applicable to any or all stations within the jurisdiction of the United States as prescribed by the Commission, and may cause the closing of any station for radio communication and the removal therefrom of its apparatus and equipment, or he may authorize the use or control of any such station and/or its apparatus and equipment by any department of the Government under such regulations as he may prescribe, upon just compensation to the owners.

The point I want to bring out is that if by the passage of this act you create a national emergency then the President can take this country over, take over the broadcasting systems, take over the newspapers, and all public means of transmitting speech and can set himself up as a dictator. You do not want that, neither do I. So why not adopt this amendment and say we are trying to prohibit any such action being taken if there is any possibility that such action might be taken?

I realize that the New Deal Members want to vote on this bill. Over on that side of the House they do not want anything but a dictatorship, and if we get a dictatorship in this country God knows it will come from that side of the House, and the public of this country knows that, too. You fellows over there have been passing such laws in the past 6 or 7 years that we have no other alternative. You can holler "Vote!" all you want, but you have brought this country just about to the edge of dictatorship, and it is time that we stop.

Mr. EBERHARTER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. RICH. No; I cannot yield to the gentleman.

This morning's Times-Herald carries an articles by Chesly Manley: "PEPPER accused of asking dictatorship for Roosevelt"—mind you, that is a United States Senator—"WHEELER blasts Florida Senator in battle over conscription bill":

PEPPER ACCUSED OF ASKING DICTATORSHIP FOR ROOSEVELT—WHEELER BLASTS FLORIDA SENATOR IN BATTLE OVER CONSCRIPTION BILL

(By Chesly Manly)

Senator CLAUDE PEPPER (Democrat), of Florida, who has proposed that Congress make President Roosevelt a dictator, argued in the Senate yesterday that it would be thoroughly democratic to invest the President with absolute power over the lives and property of all the people of the United States.

The establishment of such a totalitarian regime would be democratic, the Florida New Dealer maintained, because the same Congress which voted to give the President such powers during an "emergency" could rescind them when it deemed the emergency to have passed.

Just think of a Senator advocating the setting up of a dictator publicly. Well, how many of them might be doing it privately? Gentlemen, we are on the verge of it. This amendment cannot hurt the bill. It only curbs the power granted the President. You have given him too much, and I do not propose to grant any unnecessary powers that Congress should assume. Unless this amendment is adopted I cannot vote for this legislation.

[Here the gavel fell.]

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. RICH].

The amendment was rejected.

Mr. VOORHIS of California. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last three words.

Mr. Chairman, I hope what I am about to say is not in bad taste. I appreciate the sentiments behind the telegram read by the gentleman from Texas, but——

Mr. MURDOCK of Utah. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. VOORHIS of California. I yield to the gentleman from Utah.

Mr. MURDOCK of Utah. I think the statement made by General Birkhead, or whatever office he holds, is absolutely uncalled for when he refers to the fact that Congress is fiddling. I think the national-defense program has been put through with all the expedition and speed that General Birkhead or anyone else in the Army could expect, and I resent the statement he made.

Mr. VOORHIS of California. The gentleman has made a large portion of my speech, and I will go on from there. I thank the gentleman.

Mr. MURDOCK of Utah. I beg the gentleman's pardon.

Mr. VOORHIS of California. Mr. Chairman, it appears to me that the Congress of the United States at this moment is confronted with one of the most crucial tasks, I believe the most crucial task, in all the history of this Nation, for we are called upon to put America on a different basis from the standpoint of defense from any that she has ever been put on in all her history. But that is only half our job and the other half is even more difficult. For obviously since our purpose in the defense of democratic principles of equality, fairness, and justice, we are called upon to provide defense without abandoning that democratic way of life, and to do it on the basis of the preservation of those principles for which this Nation stands. Mr. Chairman, this is a difficult task that is going to take the best brains and the best earnestness that all of us are capable of putting forth. We are engaged in attempting to prove that a free people can make themselves strong against attack without losing their freedom; in demonstrating that a people can prepare, if need be, to defend themselves against injustice without becoming unjust to anyone.

The defense program has gone through Congress with the greatest possible speed, it seems to me. To have done it any faster would have meant to give up the very substance of the constitutional government we are seeking to defend.

There are bottlenecks, no doubt, but they certainly are not in Congress.

[Here the gavel fell.]

The CHAIRMAN. Under the rule the Committee rises.

Accordingly the Committee rose; and the Speaker having assumed the chair, Mr. WOODRUM of Virginia, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union reported that that Committee, having had under consideration Senate Joint Resolution 286, to strengthen the common defense and to authorize the President to order members and units of reserve components and retired personnel of the Regular Army into active military service, pursuant to House Resolution 567, he reported the same back to the House with sundry amendments agreed to in the Committee of the Whole.

The SPEAKER. Under the rule the previous question is ordered on the bill and amendments to final passage.

Is a separate vote demanded on any amendment? If not, the Chair will put them in gross.

The amendments were agreed to.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the third reading of the bill.

The bill was ordered to be read a third time and was read the third time.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the passage of the bill.

Mr. SHAFER of Michigan. Mr. Speaker, I offer a motion to recommit.

The SPEAKER. Is the gentleman opposed to the bill?

Mr. SHAFER of Michigan. Mr. Speaker, I am.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the motion to recommit.

The Clerk read as follows:

Mr. SHAFER of Michigan moves to recommit the bill to the Committee on Military Affairs with instructions to report it back forthwith with the following amendment: On page 5, strike out all of lines 3 to 9, inclusive, and insert:

"(d) Any member of any Reserve component of the Army of the United States shall be discharged upon his own request, made within 20 days of the date of his being ordered into the active military service of the United States."

The SPEAKER. The question is on the motion to recommit.

Mr. SHAFER of Michigan. Mr. Speaker, I ask for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were refused.

The question was taken; and on a division (demanded by Mr. SCHAFER of Wisconsin) there were—ayes 40, noes 207.

So the motion to recommit was rejected.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the passage of the joint resolution.

Mr. MAY. Mr. Speaker, on that I demand the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken; and there were—yeas 342, nays 34, not voting 54, as follows:

ADJOURNMENT OVER

Mr. RAYBURN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that when the House adjourns today it adjourns to meet on Monday next.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Texas?

There was no objection.

PRIVATE CALENDAR BUSINESS

Mr. RAYBURN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that after the call of the Consent Calendar on Monday next it may be in order to call the individual bills on the Private Calendar.

Mr. MICHENER. Reserving the right to object, Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman state what the program for the remainder of next week is, if he knows?

Mr. RAYBURN. It is assumed that the Committee on Banking and Currency will have ready for Tuesday a rule on the bill increasing the capital of the Export-Import Bank. In all probability it will take Tuesday and Wednesday to dispose of that bill. If the Committee on Ways and Means reports the tax bill by Wednesday, that bill will be taken up Thursday.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Texas?

There was no objection.

PERSONAL ANNOUNCEMENT

Mr. GAVAGAN. Mr. Speaker, I announce that my colleagues the gentlemen from New York, Mr. CELLER——

Mr. CANNON of Missouri. Mr. Speaker, I very much regret to have to call attention to the rule against announcement of how another Member would have voted if present.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Missouri objects to the announcement of how the colleagues of the gentleman from New York would have voted. Under the rule, such an announcement is not in order.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

Mr. MAY. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that all Members be granted 5 legislative days in which to revise and extend their remarks on the joint resolution just passed.

Mr. CANNON of Missouri. I regret that I have to object, Mr. Speaker. The proper method would be for the Member himself to later speak or extend remarks giving his views.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Missouri objects to the announcement.

NAVAL AVIATORS

Mr. VINSON of Georgia. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to take from the Speaker's table the bill (H. R. 10030) increasing the number of naval aviators in the line of the Regular Navy and Marine Corps, and for other purposes, with Senate amendments thereto, concur in all the Senate amendments except amendment No. 14, and disagree to amendment No. 14.

The Clerk read the title of the bill.

The Clerk read the Senate amendments as follows:

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Georgia?

Mr. SCHAFER of Wisconsin. Reserving the right to object, Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman explain the Senate amendments he is asking the House to approve by unanimous consent?

Mr. VINSON of Georgia. I am pleased to say to the House that these Senate amendments have been gone over with the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. MAAS], the ranking minority member of the Committee on Naval Affairs, and we have consented to accept all of them except amendment No. 14. They are practically clarifying amendments and do not change the bill in any respect. For instance, the House bill provided—

That officers so appointed shall upon appointment occupy the same grade.

The Senate changed that, and the Senate amendment reads:

These officers shall be appointed to the same grade occupied by them in the Naval or Marine Corps Reserve.

The gentleman from Minnesota and I have gone over these amendments. We have agreed with Senator WALSH that we cannot accept amendment No. 14, and he will recede on that amendment. The bulk of the amendments are clarifying amendments.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Georgia?

There was no objection.

Senate amendments Nos. 1 to 13 and 15 to 21 were concurred in.

Senate amendment No. 14 was disagreed to.

A motion to reconsider was laid on the table.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

Mr. JOHNSON of Oklahoma. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my own remarks in the RECORD and include therein two newspaper clippings.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Oklahoma?

There was no objection.

OVERTIME IMMIGRATION SERVICES

Mr. LESINSKI. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to take from the Speaker's desk the bill (H. R. 5403) to provide for the deposit of certain collections for overtime immigration services to the credit of the appropriation chargeable with the payment for such services, and for other purposes, with Senate amendments thereto, and concur in the Senate amendments.

The Clerk read the title of the bill.

The Clerk read the Senate amendments, as follows:

Line 3, strike out "hereafter."
Line 3, after "collected", insert "on or after July 1, 1941."

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Michigan?

Mr. MICHENER. Mr. Speaker, I reserve the right to object. Will the gentleman kindly explain this?

Mr. LESINSKI. Mr. Speaker, this bill has been passed by both the House and the Senate. It is a departmental bill. It would provide for the deposit of certain overtime collections in the Immigration Service to the credit of the proper appropriation to which they are chargeable. This charge was suggested by the Bureau of the Budget, and heretofore the money was deposited in a separate fund, and had to be transferred through an item of legislation. This simplifies the bookkeeping.

Mr. MICHENER. And we simply agree to the Senate amendment?

Mr. LESINSKI. The Senate amendment is "on and after July 1, 1940."

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The Senate amendment was agreed to, and a motion to reconsider laid on the table.

RICHARD PAUL REHN

Mr. LESINSKI. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to take from the Speaker's table the bill, H. R. 5640, to admit Richard Paul Rehn permanently to the United States, with a Senate amendment thereto, and concur in the Senate amendment.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the Senate amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

After line 6, insert:
"SEC. 2. Upon the enactment of this act, the Secretary of State shall instruct the proper quota-control officer to deduct one number from the nonpreference category of the quota during the current year."

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. MICHENER. Mr. Speaker, I reserve the right to object. This is an immigration matter. Does it come with the unanimous report of the committee?

Mr. LESINSKI. Yes. This bill was passed by our committee and passed by the House and Senate. The Senate put on the amendment that it be chargeable to the quota of the country the man came from.

Mr. MICHENER. In other words, the bill is the same as it passed the Senate with the exception that it permits one less person to enter the United States during the current year.

Mr. LESINSKI. That is correct.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Michigan?

There was no objection.

The SPEAKER. The question is on concurring in the Senate amendment.

The Senate amendment was agreed to.

A motion to reconsider laid on the table.

JOHANN RUDOLF HUENEBERG

Mr. LESINSKI. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to take from the Speaker's table the bill (H. R. 5641) to admit Johann Rudolf Hueneberg permanently to the United States, with a Senate amendment thereto, and concur in the Senate amendment.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the Senate amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

After line 6, insert:
"SEC. 2. Upon the enactment of this act the Secretary of State shall instruct the proper quota-control officer to deduct one number from the nonpreference category of the quota during the current year."

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The Senate amendment was agreed to.

A motion to reconsider laid on the table.

SAFETY IN BITUMINOUS AND ANTHRACITE MINES

Mr. KELLER. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for 1 minute.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. KELLER. Mr. Speaker, I call the attention of the House to the fact that there is a new petition on the desk, No. 35. It has to do with the mine-inspection bill that has been pending in the committees of the House and Senate for more than a year.

Mr. RANDOLPH. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. KELLER. Yes.

Mr. RANDOLPH. Is not this the bill that seeks to obtain information as to the health and safety in bituminous and anthracite mines, and also as to occupational diseases?

Mr. KELLER. It is; and since that bill came before the House more men have been killed in mines in the United States than three times the number in the House and the Senate. It is inexcusably delayed, and I hope the Members of the House will remedy that by signing petition No. 35.

Mr. SCHAFER of Wisconsin. Is this a bill under which the Federal Government will admit that the New Deal Governors of West Virginia and Illinois cannot enforce their own inspection laws?

Mr. KELLER. I do not admit any such thing, and the gentleman knows it.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

Mr. PETERSON of Georgia. Mr. Speaker, on Tuesday of this week the House had under consideration the question of granting the rule (H. R. 8157) to establish a national land policy, and to provide homesteads for actual farm families, known as the Peterson homestead bill. I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD at this point on this legislation by including therein a copy of the bill, together with an explanation of it as contained in the report and supplemental report.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The matter referred to is as follows:

A bill to establish a national land policy, and to provide homesteads for actual farm families

Be it enacted, etc., That the purposes of this act are to establish a national land policy based upon inherent human rights, to provide for every family an opportunity to own a home and earn for itself the necessities of life, to encourage private initiative, to protect each citizen in the enjoyment of the fruits of his labor, and to more firmly secure to all people their natural right of pursuit of happiness in freedom and independence.

SEC. 2. (a) The Secretary of the Interior (hereinafter referred to as the "Secretary"), through the General Land Office, is hereby authorized to purchase obligations secured by liens on farm lands, which were in effect on the date of the passage of this act, and pay for the same a price not exceeding the normal value of such lands plus the useful value of the buildings and improvements thereon, and not exceeding in any event the amount of the indebtedness under the lien at the date of purchase.

(b) Upon application of the mortgagor, the Secretary shall release the mortgagor from his liability under the obligation purchased by the Secretary, and cancel the balance of the indebtedness of the mortgagor thereunder, upon the conveyance by the mortgagor to the United States of the title to the lands securing such obligation. In case no such settlement of the obligation is made, nothing in this act shall be construed to affect the rights and liabilities of either party under the terms of the obligation.

SEC. 3. The Secretary of the Interior, through the General Land Office, is further authorized to purchase fee-simple title to farm lands held by a mortgagee or lien holder under a foreclosure concluded after January 1, 1920, and prior to the date of passage of this act, paying for the same not exceeding the normal value of such lands plus the useful value of buildings and improvements thereon, and not exceeding in any event the amount of the indebtedness under the mortgage or other lien at the time of foreclosure.

SEC. 4. All lands acquired by the United States under this act shall become a part of the public domain. The Secretary shall thereupon classify all public lands according to their adaptability for farming purposes, and lands found suitable for farming shall hereafter be disposed of only in accordance with the provisions of this act. Lands classified as not suited for farming shall be withheld for disposition under any laws otherwise applicable to the public domain, but nothing herein shall affect or interfere with the national parks, national monuments, or other Government reservations or with the operation of the mineral lands laws of the United States.

SEC. 5. The Secretary is authorized and directed to divide all public lands classified as suitable for farm purposes into tracts, to be known as homesteads, of suitable size for the support of a family of average size under normal conditions, taking into consideration the fertility of the soil and general farm conditions and requirements in the section where said lands are located: Provided, That no such tract shall contain less than 50 acres nor more than 160 acres.

SEC. 6. The Secretary shall determine, as of the time of the acquisition by him of any real property under this act, the value of such property and the value of the real property in each homestead within the tract acquired. To each such homestead the Secretary shall allocate such portion of the price paid by him for the lien or the tract, as the case may be, as the value of the homestead tract bears to the value of the portion of the tract found suitable for farm purposes.

SEC. 7. Such tracts shall be available for entry under the applicable provisions of the homestead laws, subject, however, to the following terms and conditions:

(a) No person shall be eligible except a citizen of the United States who is the head of a family.

(b) No person shall be eligible who is the owner of farm land.

(c) No person shall be eligible who shall be shown by the records of the General Land Office to have been already granted a homestead, unless he shall prove to the satisfaction of the Secretary that such homestead grant has been relinquished in a legal manner and without fault or negligence on his part.

(d) Preference shall be given to farm families in granting homesteads hereunder: Provided, That when application for entry is made by an applicant who is not the head of a farm family, notice of such application shall be posted for at least 90 days at the usual place for posting legal notices in the county seat of the county where such tract is located, and should no qualified applicant who is the head of a farm family make application within this period to enter said tract the original applicant, if otherwise qualified, shall be entitled to entry.

(e) Mortgagors living on encumbered lands at the time of liquidation of indebtedness hereunder shall have a prior right to acquire homesteads within the bounds of such lands: Provided, That they make application within 90 days after classification for entry of such lands.

(f) The applicant to whom the homestead privilege is granted and his successors in interest shall pay to the Secretary in equal annual installments the amount of the price allocated to the homestead under section 6 of this act with interest which shall be at a rate not exceeding the rate of interest at which the United States Government may borrow money at the time. Payments shall be made in not more than 40 equal annual installments, as determined by agreement between the Secretary and the individual applicant, and shall be for a period not in excess of 40 years. The whole or any part of any installment may be paid in advance, and in case of unusual and adverse conditions the Secretary may permit a reasonable postponement of payment.

(g) Each patent of homestead hereunder shall be in such form as to provide definite covenants which shall be effective and binding only so long as any portion of the amount owing on said homestead tract under the terms of paragraph (f) of this section remain unpaid and which shall contain specific stipulations, as follows:

(1) Prohibiting the sale, cutting, or removal of timber or other natural resources growing upon or contained within the homestead tract except with the consent of the Secretary, and containing such reasonable stipulations as to upkeep of buildings and fences and fire insurance on buildings as will, in the opinion of the Secretary, provide proper protection of the investment of the United States Government in the property;

(2) Prohibiting the sale or encumbrance or in any manner making such homestead tract subject to any further debt, and any exercise of or attempt to exercise any such power is hereby declared to be void and of no legal effect, except that homestead tracts may be exchanged under regulations promulgated by the Secretary;

(3) Providing for cancelation of the patent of homestead and repossession of the homestead tract by the Secretary upon default of payment of any amount due under paragraph (f) of this section, or in the event the terms of the patent of homestead are not fully complied with, or upon failure of the homesteader to pay any and all taxes or other assessments levied by the United States Government or by the State or political subdivision where the tract is located against said homestead tract or any portion thereof.

SEC. 8. The laws, including those relating to taxation, of the State or political subdivision in which any homestead tract granted hereunder is situated shall be applicable to said homestead tract in the same manner and to the same extent as to other privately owned land.

SEC. 9. There is hereby authorized to be appropriated from time to time such sums as may be necessary to carry out the provisions and intent of this act.

SEC. 10. The amounts expended under this act shall be equitably distributed among the several States and Territories.

ESTABLISHING A NATIONAL LAND POLICY AND PROVIDING HOMESTEADS FOR ACTUAL FARM FAMILIES

Mr. DEROUEN, from the Committee on the Public Lands, submitted the following report to accompany H. R. 8157:

The Committee on the Public Lands, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 8157) to establish a national land policy and to provide homesteads for actual farm families, having considered the same, report favorably thereon with an amendment and recommend that the bill, as amended, do pass.

The amendment is as follows:

Page 7, line 10, beginning with the word "However", strike out the rest of section 9.

STATEMENT

This legislation does not provide for the creation of any new Federal agency or the appointment of any additional officeholders or employees.

It declares a definite national land policy which may hereafter be put into effect by Congress, and it authorizes the appropriation of such sums as may be deemed necessary or expedient in carrying out its provisions.

The measure is so drawn that, should Congress at any time find the program unsatisfactory, its further operation could easily be discontinued without affecting in any manner any agency of the Government or involving the Federal Government in further expenditures.

However, should its provisions be found satisfactory, this legislation opens up the way for the elimination of many Government agencies and the consequent simplification of our Federal structure.

EXPLANATION OF THE BILL

Under this measure the Nation's traditional homestead laws are amended so as to provide a simple and effective remedy, free of regimentation, with which to meet the present-day problem of farm-home ownership.

In the first place, it provides assistance for farm families who now hold title to the farm homestead upon which they now live and from which they are attempting to earn a livelihood, but who are unable to provide even the bare necessities of life and at the same time meet the obligations of a farm-mortgage debt. In other words, it lends aid to the owner-operator, whose farm homestead is heavily mortgaged, while he is still in possession of his farm homestead rather than waiting until after he is reduced to tenantry.

At the same time, it opens up the pathway to farm homestead ownership for present tenant farmers and for other American citizens who are now without means to provide a livelihood for themselves and their families.

COST OF THIS PROGRAM

The money spent by the Federal Government under this program will not create any new debt. Neither will it increase the total outstanding debt or the total farm-mortgage debt of this country one penny. Furthermore, this money is to be repaid, with interest, to the Government over a period of 40 years, during which time no additional debts can be incurred against the tracts of land involved.

Thus it can be seen that this legislation, instead of increasing the cost of Government, provides a sound method by which the total outstanding debts of this country as well as the total farm-mortgage debts may be gradually reduced. And the permanent relief afforded through this program brings definite hope for reduced Federal expenditures in future years.

BRIEF SUMMARY OF BENEFITS WHICH MAY REASONABLY BE EXPECTED TO RESULT FROM ENACTMENT OF THIS PROGRAM

1. It will tend to check the flood of farm-mortgage foreclosures.

2. It will provide for the orderly liquidation of farm-mortgage debts.

3. It will put at the disposal of the United States a considerable quantity of farm lands available for entry by tenant farmers and other American citizens, under the machinery of the existing Homestead Act, as amended by this act.

4. Through the gradual liquidation of farm-mortgage debts and material reductions in interest and carrying charges on these debts, it will relieve farm income of the burden of such debts, thus restoring the purchasing power of farm income and opening up new consumer markets of vast proportions.

5. Most important of all, it will tend to preserve the family-size farm in this Nation for the use of actual farm families who are willing to live on these farms and earn a livelihood through tilling the soil.

PROVISIONS OF THE BILL IN DETAIL

The Secretary of the Interior, through the General Land Office, is authorized to acquire lands now in private possession through the purchase of outstanding liens and to make such lands so acquired a part of the public domain. The Secretary, however, is specifically prohibited from taking such action except upon application by the owner of the land involved.

Tracts of farm land on which mortgages have been foreclosed any time since January 1, 1920, and which are still in possession of the mortgagee, may also be acquired by the Secretary of the Interior, through payment for such tracts of a sum not exceeding the amount of the lien at the time of foreclosure.

The Secretary of the Interior is directed to classify all lands acquired under this act according to their adaptability for farming purposes.

Lands unsuited for farm purposes are to be withheld from private entry.

Lands suitable for farm purposes are to be divided into tracts, to be known as homesteads, of suitable size for the support of a family of average size under normal conditions, taking into consideration the fertility of the soil and general farm conditions and requirements in the section where said lands are located, provided that no tract shall contain less than 50 acres nor more than 160 acres.

To each homestead tract there shall be allocated such portion of the price paid by the Secretary for the lien as the value of the homestead tract bears to the value of the entire tract acquired.

These tracts are made available for entry under the Homestead Act of 1862, as amended, and subject to the following provisions:

1. Any citizen of the United States who is the head of a family is eligible to apply for a homestead, provided that such citizen is not already the owner of farm land and has not previously been granted a homestead (unless he shall prove that such homestead grant has been relinquished in a legal manner and without fault or negligence on his part).

2. Preference, for a period of 90 days, shall be given to farm families in granting homesteads. If an application for entry is made by an applicant who is not the head of a farm family, 90 days' public notice shall be given; and should no qualified farm family make application within this period to enter said tract, the original applicant shall then be entitled to entry.

3. A mortgagor living on encumbered lands at the time of liquidation of the indebtedness on said land by the Secretary of the Interior shall be given a prior right to acquire a homestead within the bounds of such lands, provided such mortgagor files his application within 90 days after such land is classified for entry.

4. The cost of the homestead tract to the United States shall be repaid by the homesteader in equal annual installments, not exceeding 40, with interest, which shall be at a rate not exceeding the rate of interest at which the United States Government may borrow money at the time.

5. Homesteads granted hereunder shall not be subject to any further debt or encumbrance of any nature, nor to sale, except that they may be exchanged under regulations by the Secretary of the Interior. However, these provisions shall be effective and binding only so long as any portion of the amount owing to the United States on said homestead tract remains unpaid.

6. All lands coming into possession of the United States Government under this act shall be subject to the laws, including those relating to taxation, of the State and political subdivision in which said lands are situated.

7. The amounts expended under this act shall be equitably distributed among the several States and Territories.

NECESSITY FOR THIS LEGISLATION

During his campaign for reelection in 1936, President Roosevelt stated that—

"In all our plans we are guided, and will continue to be guided, by the fundamental belief that the American farmer, living on his own land, remains our ideal of self-reliance and of spiritual balance—the source from which the reservoirs of the Nation's strength are constantly renewed. It is from the men and women of our farms—living close to the soil—that this Nation, like the Greek giant Antaeus, touches Mother Earth and rises with strength renewed a hundredfold. We want to perpetuate that ideal under modern conditions so that man may be strong in the ancient virtues and yet lay hold of the advantages which science and new knowledge offer to a well-rounded life."

On account of the vast amount of free land suitable for farming purposes, it has always, until recent years, been a rather easy matter for a family to own a farm home in America. It is upon this fundamental fact that our fame as the land of opportunity largely rests.

Yet there has been no protection thrown around these farm homestead units by the Federal Government, preserving them for farm families desiring to live on their own land.

So long as there was an ample supply of public domain, available for private entry under our homestead laws, such protection was not absolutely essential. The Nation's free soil of itself safeguarded to a degree the right of the American farmer to live upon his own land.

However, the supply of desirable free soil has become exhausted. There no longer exists in America this haven of safety, this natural fortress for the protection of human liberty and freedom, and as a result America today faces a problem different from any heretofore confronting our people.

Tenantry and farm-mortgage debts on owner-operated farms are rapidly increasing, while the ranks of the independent group of farmers who live on their own land free of debt grow thinner.

In 1930, when the last complete census was taken, there remained, of our total farm population, only 29.4 percent of the farmers who owned their own farms free of debt. Two-thirds of the farmers were either tenants or owners with mortgage debts over their farms (42.4 percent were tenants and 23.8 percent were owners with mortgages on their farms).

LAND POLICY ACT PROVIDING HOMESTEADS FOR ACTUAL FARM FAMILIES

SUPPLEMENTAL REPORT—HEARINGS, SEVENTY-SIXTH CONGRESS, THIRD SESSION, APRIL 18, 1940

The traditional homestead policies of this Nation have been proven to be highly satisfactory in providing opportunities for rural settlers to acquire their own farm homes.

Although such policies have prevailed in this country since early colonial days it has been found necessary to revise them from time to time in order to meet the problems which have naturally arisen as the Nation grew and developed and as conditions changed.

Under this measure it is now proposed to amend and modify the Federal homestead laws so as to make them effective in meeting the present-day problem of farm-home ownership.

Its provisions are simple and easily understood.

It provides two ways by which the Federal Government may acquire farm land, which will again be made available for private entry: First, through the purchase of obligations secured by liens on farm land and acceptance of title to the land from the mortgagor in settlement of the obligation; and, second, through purchase of tracts of farm land on which mortgages have been foreclosed at any time since January 1, 1920, and which are still in the possession of the mortgagee.

The land so acquired is to be divided into homestead tracts of not less than 50 acres or more than 160 acres.

There is to be charged against each homestead tract its pro rata part of the cost to the Government of the entire tract.

Applications for entry upon these homestead tracts are to be made to the General Land Office under the existing homestead laws as amended by this act.

The General Land Office is the logical agency to administer this act. It was created in 1812, and since that time has administered hundreds of thousands of homestead tracts and collected millions of dollars from the sale of farm lands.

There is submitted below a letter from the General Land Office to which is attached definite data regarding these transactions.

DEPARTMENT OF THE INTERIOR,
GENERAL LAND OFFICE,

Statistics: Number and area of homesteads to June 30, 1936.

Hon. HUGH PETERSON,
House of Representatives.

MY DEAR MR. PETERSON: Referring to our recent conversation over the telephone there is enclosed a tabulation setting forth the number and area of homesteads originally allowed in the public-land States and Alaska, also the number and acreage embraced in perfected entries including those entries completed under the commutation provision whereby the homesteader pays the Government price of the land after residing thereon the minimum period required by law. This compilation does not include entries of ceded Indian lands. There is also enclosed a diagram showing the acreage entered annually under the homestead laws and the acreage appropriated under cash sales, etc.

A carbon copy of this letter is also enclosed.

Very respectfully,

ANTOINETTE FUNK,
Assistant Commissioner.

EFFECT OF BOOMS AND DEPRESSIONS ON PUBLIC-LAND APPROPRIATION

THE SEVEN MAJOR DEPRESSIONS OF UNITED STATES HISTORY

Report of Public Lands Commission, 1904: "It would appear that the disposal of the public lands follows much the same course as transactions relating to business generally. During periods of domestic depression public lands of the Government, like those belonging to private owners, do not seem to be in demand, while during periods of great commercial and business activity the demand for public lands keeps pace with the volume of business transacted.

Annual Report (1928) of Department of Public Lands, Queensland, Australia: "In the early days of settlement a family would settle on the land, produce almost all its own requirements, and earn in actual money a very small income, which would be expended on articles which the farm could not produce. To live, rather than to earn or produce for the use of others, was the dominating purpose. Now all this has changed. The modern view is that, unless the income received from the products of the farm can approximate the money that would be earned from similar energies elsewhere, there is no inducement to settle on the land. * * *"

[1] The 19,399,158 acres were sold under a credit system that collapsed in the panic of 1819 reducing the net disposals to 13,642,536 acres for which $27,900,370 was actually received.

Hibbard's History of Public Land Policies. "The first real craze of speculation came just after the War of 1812. * * * The hard times of 1819 were attributed in large measure to speculation in land. * * * The next great period of speculation was that preceding the panic of 1837. * * * There was a decided lull during the early part of the 20 years between 1837 and 1857 with a perfect rage of speculation again during the latter years of this period. * * * The greatest wave of speculation preceded the panic of 1857. * * * On two of these occasions cheap money played a large role in the deals. On the third (1857) it was military scrip (Mexican War warrants) that made speculation unduly easy." (The cheap price of land under the Graduation Act of 1854 also assisted the boom preceding the 1857 panic.)

PANIC OF 1837

Encyclopedia Britannica (vol. 27, p. 699): "The chaos into which a part of American society had been thrown had a marked effect on the financial institutions of the country, which went to pieces before it for a time. It had not been meant to make the public lands of the United States a source of revenue so much as a source of development. The sales had touched their high-water mark during the speculative year 1819, when receipts from them had amounted to $3,274,000; in other years they seldom went above $2,000,000. When the railway set the stream of migration moving faster than ever, and cities began to grow like mushrooms, it was natural that speculation in land should feel the effects. Sales rose to $3,200,000 in 1831, to $4,000,000 in 1833, to $5,000,000 in 1834, to $15,000,000 in 1835, and to $25,000,000 in 1836. In 1835 the President announced to Congress that the public debt was extinguished, and that some way of dealing with the surplus should be found. Calhoun's proposal that after the year 1836 any surplus in excess of $5,000,000 should be divided among the States as a loan, was adopted, as regards the surplus (almost $37,000,000) of that year; and some $28,000,000—still carried on the books of the Treasury as unavailable funds—were actually distributed before the crisis of 1837 put an end to the surplus and the policy. The States had already taken a hand in the general speculation by beginning works of public improvement. Foreign, particularly English, capital was abundant; and States which had been accustomed to think a dozen times over a tax of a hundred thousand dollars now began to negotiate loans of millions of dollars and to appropriate the proceeds to the digging of canals and the construction of railways. Their enterprises were badly conceived and badly managed, and only added to the confusion when the crash came. If the Federal Government and the States felt that they were rich, the imaginations of individuals ran riot. Everyone wanted to buy; prices rose, and everyone was growing richer on paper. The assessed value of real estate in New York City in 1832 was $104,000,000; in 1836 it had grown to $253,000,000. In Mobile the assessed value rose from $1,000,000 to $27,000,000. Fictitious values were the rule.

FORMATION OF UNSOUND, UNREGULATED STATE BANKS

"It was not until after the crash that New York began the system of compelling such deposits as would really secure circulation, which was long afterward developed into the present national bank system. In most of the States banks could be freely organized with or without tangible capital, and their notes could be sent to the West for the purchase of Government lands, which needed to be held but a month or two to gain a handsome profit. 'Wildcat' banks sprang up all over the country; and the 'pet banks,' as those chosen for the deposit of Government revenues were called, went into speculation as eagerly as the banks which hardly pretended to have capital * * *.

"In July 1836, Jackson's Secretary of the Treasury ordered land agents to take nothing in payment for lands except gold and silver * * *. The 'specie circular' turned the tide of paper back East, and when it was presented for payment most of the banks suspended specie payment with hardly a struggle. There was no longer a thought of buying; everyone wanted to sell; and prices ran down with a rapidity even more startling than that with which they had risen. Failures, to an extent and on a scale unprecedented in the United States, made up the 'panic of '37.' (Many States repudiated their debts.) Even the Federal Government felt the strain, for its revenues were locked up in suspended banks. A little more than a year after Congress had authorized the distribution of its surplus revenue among the States Van Buren was forced to call it into special session to provide some relief for the Government itself."

The applicant is to have 40 years to repay to the Government its investment in the homestead tract upon which he enters and cannot further encumber the tract until the Government has been repaid in full.

The rate of interest shall be the same as that being paid by the Government.

Any American citizen who is the head of a family may apply for entry. However, prior rights to entry are given to families living on the land at the time of purchase by the General Land Office. (This is in keeping with the principle of preemption which has prevailed in this country for generations.)

Proceedings under this measure are free of the elements of regimentation and are in harmony with the traditional homestead policies of this Nation.

In view of the fact that the applicant for entry upon a homestead tract must either live on the tract or agree to move on it, it is evident that this measure will apply primarily to owner-operated farms which are now mortgaged rather than to mortgaged farms owned by absentee landlords.

The restrictions provided in the bill are such that only those owner-operators who are really in distress and who are threatened with the loss of their farm home through foreclosure are likely to apply for this Federal aid.

There are in the United States, according to figures for 1935 as furnished by the Bureau of the Census, 1,619,165 mortgaged farms in the owner-operated class. This represents 23.8 percent of the entire number of farms in the Nation, and about 69 percent of the mortgaged farms.

There are submitted below tables showing this information.

1935 and 1930 figures supplied by Agricultural Division, Bureau of Census, Mar. 10, 1938.

Under any reasonable administration of this measure it is only logical that those owner-operator farm families who are in greatest distress on account of threatened foreclosure of farm mortgages will receive first consideration.

A definite idea as to the amount of money that will be involved can be gotten by a study of the figures on farm mortgages and on foreclosures that have been submitted by the Federal land banks, the Federal Farm Mortgage Corporation, the Department of Agriculture, and other governmental agencies.

These figures show that in 1935 the average mortgaged debt on the average owner-operated mortgaged farm in the United States was $3,024.

There is submitted below a table giving this and other information. This table appears as table 3 of a pamphlet issued jointly by the Department of Commerce and the Department of Agriculture, designated as farm mortgage indebtedness in the United States, on August 26, 1937.

[1] District of Columbia figures included with Maryland.

The Farm Credit Administration advises that in 1939 that agency foreclosed on 12,963 farms (voluntary deeds are not included in these figures), containing a total estimated acreage of 3,000,000. This is an average of 231 acres per farm.

There is submitted below a letter from the Farm Credit Administration dated April 8, 1940, in which this information is given.

FARM CREDIT ADMINISTRATION,
Washington, D. C., April 8, 1940.

Hon. HUGH PETERSON,
House of Representatives.

DEAR MR. PETERSON: In compliance with your request by telephone today, there is furnished below the estimated acreage of farms foreclosed by the Federal land banks and the Federal Farm Mortgage Corporation during the calendar year 1939.

Institution	Number of farms upon which foreclosure was completed [1]	Estimated acreage
Federal land banks	7,461	1,800,000
Federal Farm Mortgage Corporation	5,502	1,200,000
Total	12,963	3,000,000

[1] Includes mortgage loans, purchase-money mortgages, and contracts foreclosed.

In connection with the above table it should be pointed out that voluntary deeds are not included. The figure for the Federal land banks will, therefore, vary from the information furnished to you on March 6, which included voluntary deeds since this was the only way in which comparable figures for the entire period 1929 through 1939 could be given. It should also be mentioned that the figures in the above table exclude any duplication with respect to foreclosures as between the Federal land banks and Federal Farm Mortgage Corporation.

With kind personal regards,

Sincerely,

CLIFF WOODWARD,
Special Assistant to the Governor.

There are also submitted herewith two letters from the Farm Credit Administration, one dated March 6, 1940, and one dated April 4, 1940. Attached to these letters are tables giving much valuable data relating to farms mortgaged through this agency of the Government:

Data on foreclosures for the year 1938 have been corrected to include voluntary deeds for the period July 1 to December 31, 1938.

With kind personal regards,

Very truly yours,

[1] Based on reports from counties, including from 22 to 30 percent of the farms in the United States.

Farm Credit Quarterly, Dec. 31, 1939.

From the above figures it can be seen that in 1939 the Farm Credit Administration (Federal land banks and the Federal Farm Mortgage Corporation combined) completed foreclosures on a total of 16,069 farms, and the total amount involved was $49,639,000, or $3,089 per farm.

The acreage foreclosed, at 231 acres per farm, was 3,711,939 acres.

Under the provisions of this measure the General Land Office could have acquired this entire acreage for not exceeding the above sum of $49,639,000.

Presuming that 100 acres constitute a reasonable average-size homestead unit (it is understood that the size of the average unit now being set up under other agencies is slightly more than this), a total of 37,119 homestead units could have been set up and made available for entry at a reduction in average cost from $3,089 per farm to $1,337 per farm homestead unit.

Thus it would have been possible under this measure to not only help 16,069 farm families retain their farm homes but also to elevate 21,050 families, in addition, to the group of farm-home owners. And while accomplishing these ends the total burden of farm-mortgage debt would not have been increased 1 cent, but would have been materially reduced. At the same time the Government would have made an absolutely sound and secure investment.

In a letter from the Department of Agriculture, dated April 2, 1940, it is estimated that in 1939, foreclosures were made by all lending agencies on a total of 32,550 farms. The letter is submitted herewith.

DEPARTMENT OF AGRICULTURE,
BUREAU OF AGRICULTURAL ECONOMICS,
Washington, D. C., April 2, 1940.

Hon. HUGH PETERSON,
House of Representatives.

DEAR MR. PETERSON: This will reply to your request by telephone for further information on farm-mortgage credit.

With respect to your inquiry as to the total amount of farm-mortgage debt held by the Federal land banks and Land Bank Commissioner, you will find enclosed a current issue of the Agricultural Finance Review summarizing recent developments in the field of farm credit. Table 1 of the appendix, page 88 of this Review, gives data on the total farm-mortgage debt by years, 1910 through 1939, and the amount of farm-mortgage debt held by leading lending agencies, including Federal land banks, Federal Land Bank Commissioner, insurance companies, commercial banks, joint-stock land banks, and others. As of January 1, 1939, the Federal land banks and the Land Bank Commissioner together held 38.5 percent of the total farm-mortgage debt, while the Federal land banks alone held about 28 percent. The amount of farm-mortgage debt outstanding on January 1, 1933–39 for each of the two federally sponsored agencies mentioned is tabulated in table 5, page 89 of the appendix. The total outstanding loans for these two agencies decreased from $2,923,000,000 on January 1, 1939, to $2,584,000,000 on January 1, 1940.

On page 51 of the enclosed Review, loan operations of the Federal land banks and the Land Bank Commissioner during the first 9 months of 1939 are reviewed, including information relative to the percentage of the total farm-mortgage debt held by these agencies as of January 1, 1939. Figure 2, page 54, shows these ratios by States for this date. In order that you may have a comparison of the ratios on January 1, 1939, to an earlier period there is also enclosed, entitled "Figure 1," a comparable ratio, by States, for January 1, 1929. Whereas the percentage of the total farm-mortgage debt held by the Federal land banks and Land Bank Commissioner on January 1, 1939 was 38.5 percent, the amount held by the Federal land banks on January 1, 1929 was only 12.1 percent.

With respect to the amount of total farm-mortgage debt held by life-insurance companies there are also enclosed two charts, one indicating the percentage of the total farm-mortgage debt held by life-insurance companies on January 1, 1929, and the other for January 1, 1939 (figs. 2 and 3). It will be noted that on January 1, 1929, life-insurance companies held 21.9 percent of the total farm-mortgage debt, whereas by January 1, 1939, this had decreased to only 12.5 percent.

With respect to delinquencies for the Federal land banks and Land Bank Commissioner, there are enclosed two charts showing the number of loans delinquent as a percentage of the number of loans outstanding on December 31, 1939. The figure for the Federal Farm Mortgage Corporation refers to Land Bank Commissioner loans. Similar charts are not available for life-insurance companies. However, the delinquencies for life-insurance companies are indicated by the following data based upon the records of 26 of the largest companies as of December 31, 1938. Of the total unpaid principal on farm mortgages of $572,000,000, including foreclosed liens subject to redemption, 14.7 percent were delinquent as to interest for 3 months or more. Nine and three-tenths percent were delinquent as to interest 1 year or more. The amounts delinquent as to interest for 3 months or more were distributed as follows:

	Percent
3 months to 1 year	5.45
1 to 2 years	3.59
2 to 3 years	1.86
Over 3 years	3.81
Total	14.71

With respect to your request for information on the number of loans which were straight Federal land-bank loans, the number which were single Land Bank Commissioner loans and the number which were joint Federal land bank and Land Bank Commissioner loans which were straight Federal land-bank loans, the number closed between May 1, 1933, and December 31, 1939, 14.6 percent were straight Federal land-bank loans, 43.5 percent were single Land Bank Commissioner loans, and the remainder, or 41.9 percent, were joint loans. The amount closed, however, shows a somewhat different pattern; of the $2,389,000,000 loans closed during the aforementioned period, 13.7 percent were straight Federal land-bank loans and 18.6 percent were single Land Bank Commissioner loans, whereas 67.7 percent were joint Federal land-bank and Land Bank Commissioner loans. A tabulation of these data by land-bank districts is also enclosed (table 1). In all cases of joint land-bank and Land Bank Commissioner loans, the land banks hold the senior mortgage and the Land Bank Commissioner holds the junior mortgage. While there are a few cases where the Commissioner holds a junior mortgage on farms where lenders other than the Federal land banks hold the senior mortgage, these are insignificant and amount to probably not more than 0.5 percent of the total number of loans now outstanding.

With respect to the relationship of foreclosures per thousand mortgaged farms and forced transfers per thousand of all farms, it will be noted from the "Real estate situation" enclosed with my letter of March 23 (table 13, p. 32), that the number of farms changing ownership through forced sales and related defaults for 1939 amounted to 16.8 farms per thousand of all farms. As mortgaged farms are probably about one-third of all farms, this would mean that the number of farms changing ownership by forced sales and related defaults was about 50 farms per thousand mortgaged farms. If the number of mortgaged farms is used as 2,350,000, the number of farms transferred because of forced sales or related defaults would be 117,500, whereas it is estimated that about 32,550 farms, or 15 farms per thousand mortgaged farms, were transferred because of foreclosure.

There are no available data which would indicate the number of forced transfers on debt-free farms, and it cannot be concluded from the number of forced transfers of farms expressed as a number per 1,000 of all farms or the number per 1,000 of mortgaged farms, how many involuntary transfers occurred on mortgaged or non-mortgaged farms. The data for forced sales include sales for delinquent taxes which frequently do not result in loss of ownership.

From available data it appears that the number of farms foreclosed by the Federal land banks and Land Bank Commissioner were equal to about 73.4 percent of the number of farms acquired by those agencies during the period 1934–39. This does not mean, however, that 73.4 percent of the farms acquired by the Federal land bank and Land Bank Commissioner were acquired through foreclosure, as a considerable number of the farms foreclosed did not result in the acquirement of the farm. The percentage of farms acquired by these agencies through foreclosure proceedings will therefore be somewhat less than 73.4.

If this office can be of further assistance, feel free to call upon us.

Very truly yours,

NORMAN J. WALL,
Head, Division of Agricultural Finance.

Presuming that 69 percent of these 32,550 foreclosures were on owner-operated farms (no definite figures on this are available, however it is shown that 69 percent of the mortgaged farms are owner-operated) and that the farms were of the same average size as those upon which the Farm Credit Administration foreclosed, viz, 231 acres, foreclosures were made on a total of 22,460 owner-operated farms comprising 5,188,260 acres, and it is reasonable to assume that this group of farm families were either reduced to tenantry or moved away from the farm during 1939.

Under this measure, however, all these farm tracts could have been acquired and refinanced by the General Land Office at a cost of $3,089 per farm tract (taking Farm Credit Administration figures for the average), or a total of $69,378,940.

By dividing the tracts into homestead units of 100 acres average size the farm home of each of these 22,460 families could have been saved from foreclosure and there would have also been made available for other families a total of 29,422 additional farm-homestead units. The debt against each owner would have been reduced from $3,089 to $1,337.

Thus it can be seen that for the sum of only $69,378,940, or $1,337 per homestead unit, it would have been possible through this measure to completely check the increase of tenantry in 1939 insofar as it was brought about through foreclosure of farm-mortgage debts, and place a total of 51,882 families in a safe position as farm-home owners. At the same time the aggregate farm-mortgage debt would not have been increased one penny, and the Government would have made an absolutely sound and secure investment.

A cost of less than $1,400 per family for rehabilitating American families in their own farm homes appears to compare favorably with the present cost to the Government of almost $1,000 annually for every person on relief, especially when it is remembered that the $1,400 will be repaid to the Government.

It is recognized that the calculations made in this report cannot be entirely accurate, but they are sufficiently accurate to conclusively prove the economy of this measure and the soundness of its provisions.

The general provisions of this legislation are explained in the report which has already been submitted by the committee.

EXPLANATION OF VOTE

Mr. ENGLEBRIGHT. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for one-half minute to make a short statement.

The SPEAKER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

There was no objection.

Mr. ENGLEBRIGHT. Mr. Speaker, I am authorized to state that had Mr. ANDRESEN of Minnesota, and Mr. HOPE, of Kansas, been present they would have voted "aye"——

The SPEAKER. The Chair cannot entertain that statement in view of the objection made by the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. CANNON] earlier in the day, to other statements of that sort.

Mr. CANNON of Missouri. Mr. Speaker, it is not a matter of any Member objecting but, under the rules, the Chair is not permitted to recognize Members for that purpose.

Mr. WOLCOTT. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CANNON of Missouri. I yield.

Mr. WOLCOTT. May not the whip or the leader, or whoever is charged with that responsibility obtain a minute to address the House for that purpose by unanimous consent?

Mr. CANNON of Missouri. Unfortunately, the whips, like other Members, are subject to the rules of the House. It is a rule which has been observed for a hundred years, and, like every other rule of the House, there is an excellent reason for its observance.

In the first place, it places a Member on record by proxy. A Member may not be recorded unless present and answering when his name is called and a Member may not vote by proxy. Such announcements in effect nullify both these provisions of the rules and place Members on record on the announcement of a colleague.

In the second place, such announcements flagrantly misrepresent the position of other Members of the House. The clerks pair all absent Members. All Members who fail to answer on roll call are arbitrarily paired without consulting their wishes or inquiring as to their attitude on the question on which the vote is taken, and always without their knowledge or consent as to with whom paired. Then for some Member to rise on the floor at the conclusion of the vote and announce that the Member with whom they are unwittingly paired would have voted in the affirmative or the negative if present, automatically places them on the opposite of the question although they may have been emphatically pledged to their constituency to the contrary. Again, such announcements are a reflection on all Members who, through some unavoidable exigency, failed to vote on the roll call, as they infer less interest in the proceedings and less attention to the question at issue than that exhibited by the Members whose position is announced by an assiduous, if not officious, colleague. If such a practice should become general it would impose on spokesmen for each delegation in the House the nerve-wracking duty of seeing that every Member of his delegation was accounted for in these announcements at the close of every vote thereby contributing immeasurably to the confusion on the floor and the delay in the proceedings of the House every time the roll was called.

Not the least objectionable feature of this violation of the rules is its encouragement of delinquency. When a Member may enter his appearance in and be placed of record in this manner he has less hesitancy in absenting himself from the Chamber and the city. Something like 40 Members were included in a recent announcement of this character, and if it is extended to permit the whips on either side of the aisle to thus round up their charges, it is easy to foresee a situation in which a majority of the membership of the House might leave their vote and their conscience in the keeping of a colleague while they attend to more inviting matters. In fact, so objectionable is the practice that the Chair has held that Members could not be recognized even for the purpose of asking unanimous consent to make such announcements.

Mr. WOLCOTT. Will the gentleman yield further?

Mr. CANNON of Missouri. I yield.

Mr. WOLCOTT. I am merely asking this question to clarify the matter. I can see the gentleman's point, but is this a rule or a tradition?

Mr. CANNON of Missouri. It is a practice of immemorial standing. There are decisions by practically every Speaker of the House since Muhlenberg to the effect that the Chair cannot recognize for that purpose.

Mr. WOLCOTT. It would not be violating any of the rules if the whip on either side, for the purpose of announcing the votes, asked unanimous consent to proceed for 1 minute for that purpose, would it?

Mr. CANNON of Missouri. The Speaker is not authorized to put a unanimous consent request for that purpose. You cannot vitiate the rule by indirection. It is a long-established rule that you cannot do by indirection anything directly prohibited by the rules.

Mr. WOLCOTT. That is why I asked if it was a rule or simply a practice.

Mr. CANNON of Missouri. Both. The rules do not provide for it and the practice of the House does not permit it.

Mr. WOLCOTT. There is nothing in the written rules of the House to prevent it, as I understand?

Mr. CANNON of Missouri. There is nothing in the written rules of the House to permit it.

Mr. WOLCOTT. But the gentleman is familiar with the rules. Will he advise the House whether there is anything in the written rules which prevents such announcement?

Mr. CANNON of Missouri. The gentleman remembers the statement by the distinguished Member from Ohio, Mr. Longworth, at one time Speaker of the House, in which he said that about half of the law of the House was written and half unwritten, and that frequently the unwritten was the more important of the two. And Speaker Cannon, in passing on a point of order in a proceedings under suspension of the rules, pointed out that the motion not only suspended all rules but included in its scope the unwritten law and practice of the House.

Mr. GAVAGAN. The gentleman concedes that the written rules of the House make no provision for the gentleman's objection to the unanimous-consent request.

Mr. CANNON of Missouri. The written rules of the House make no provision for it. It is not permissible under the rules.

Mr. GAVAGAN. I would like also to call the gentleman's attention to a specific rule of this House which prevents Members from voting standing here in the Well of the House; yet I have seen the gentleman time in and time out violate that rule. From today onward the gentleman will stand at his seat and vote.

Mr. CANNON of Missouri. I would like to have the gentleman cite an occasion when I did so.

Mr. GAVAGAN. I submit that repeatedly the gentleman has stood in the Well of this House and voted.

Mr. CANNON of Missouri. The gentleman is mistaken about that.

Mr. GAVAGAN. Unquestionably the gentleman is not mistaken, and from today onward the gentleman from Missouri will vote from his seat and not the Well.

Mr. CANNON of Missouri. The gentleman's memory is in error. I positively have never violated that rule.

Mr. MARCANTONIO. As I understand the situation now, the gentleman from California asked and did receive unanimous consent to proceed for one-half minute.

Mr. CANNON of Missouri. A Member speaking under unanimous consent cannot violate a rule of the House.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from California asked unanimous consent to proceed for one-half minute. When he got to the point of stating how certain Members would have voted, the Chair, under the protest made by the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. CANNON], said the Chair could not recognize him for that purpose. There are a number of precedents to sustain the Chair in this ruling.

Mr. MAY. Mr. Speaker, a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

NATIONAL GUARD BILL

Mr. MAY. The House has just passed Senate Joint Resolution 286. I have received a request from the chairman of the Senate Military Affairs Committee to the effect that it would be desirable to have the Senate resolution as amended by the House printed, so that the conference may be expedited. Can this be done before the bill is messaged to the Senate?

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman submit a unanimous-consent request that the Clerk be authorized to print the Senate bill with the House amendments numbered?

Mr. MAY. Mr. Speaker, I make that request.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Kentucky?

There was no objection.

RULE REGARDING ANNOUNCEMENT OF HOW MEMBER WOULD VOTE

Mr. ENGLEBRIGHT. Mr. Speaker, a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. ENGLEBRIGHT. Did not the Chair previous to my request recognize the gentleman from New York [Mr. GAVAGAN] to make a statement with reference to absent Members? I was under that impression, and with that thought in mind I asked the same privilege.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Missouri objected to the gentleman from New York making that statement, and the Chair enforced the same rule against the gentleman from New York. The Chair showed no partiality in enforcing it against the gentleman from California.

Mr. CANNON of Missouri. Mr. Speaker, a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. CANNON of Missouri. Would it be in order for the Speaker to recognize a Member to do by indirection what he could not do by direction?

The SPEAKER. The Chair doubts if that is a proper parliamentary inquiry. It calls for a conclusion on the part of the Chair.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

Mr. SMITH of Ohio. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my own remarks and to include therein some charts prepared by the Department of Commerce. There was no objection.

There was no objection.

There was no objection.

Mr. HOFFMAN. Mr. Speaker, I have two unanimous-consent requests: first, to extend my own remarks in the RECORD and to include therein an editorial; and, second, to extend my own remarks in the RECORD and to include therein a newspaper article.
